To think of women going about nights with a jimmy and a dark lantern, opening doors and windows, and sneaking about rooms, is degrading. If a male burglar gets into your house, and he is discovered, you can shoot him, if you get the drop on him, or kick him down stairs, but who wants to shoot a female burglar, or kick her over the bannisters? You would almost rather let her go ahead and burgle, and go away with your roll of money, than to shoot her. Beside, you could not hit her with a bullet from an ordinary pistol in a vital part. The heart and other vital organs are covered with bullet-proof corsets, liver and lung pads, porus plasters, etc. You take a corset and tie it around a sack of flour, and try to fire a bullet through it, and you will find that the bullet will fall to the ground. A liver pad is as good as boiler iron to protect the form, so you see there is no place to shoot a female burglar, except in the head, and no gentleman would want to shoot a beautiful woman in the face, and with a long dress on, he might as well shut his eyes and shoot at a hop yard, and expect to hit a pole, as to expect to hit a leg. Then, again, the natural gallantry of a man would prevent his making much of a fuss if he found a female burglar in the house. If the average man, and most men are average men, should wake up in the night and see a woman burglar feeling in his pants, rifling the pockets, or rummaging the drawers of the bureau, he would lay still and let her burgle as long as she would keep still and not wake up his wife. Were it a male burglar, he would jump up, regardless of his nocturnal costume, and tell him to get out of there, but he would hesitate to get up before a female burglar and ask her to make herself scarce, on the ground that she was too plenty. He would not feel like accosting the female burglar without an introduction. If he spoke to her familiarly, she would be justified in being indignant, and turn her back upon him, and say she was insulted. It places a man of gallantry in a very embarrassing situation to have a female burglar rob his house, because he would be no gentleman if he did not offer to see her safe home. No true gentleman would like to see a female burglar go home alone at three o'clock in the morning, and while he might feel the loss of his property, it would be courtesy for him to offer to see her home, and help carry the swag. Take it all around, if the women come to be burglars there is going to be more or less annoyance.—Peck's Sun.

Almost Young Again.

My mother was afflicted a long time with Neuralgia and a dull, heavy, inactive condition of the whole system; headache, nervous prostration, and was almost helpless. No physicians or medicines did her any good. Three months ago she began to use Hop Bitters, with such good effect that she seems and feels young again, although over 70 years old. We think there is no other medicine fit to use in the family."—A lady in Providence, R. I.—Journal.

A Greenhorn's Irish Experience.

A story is told of an Englishman who landed in Dublin filled with apprehension that the life of any loyal subject of Her Majesty was not worth a farthing there and thereabouts. The Land Leaguers, he imagined, were all bloodthirsty assassins, and all that sort of thing. But it was his duty to travel in the land—a duty he approached with fear and trembling.

Now there happened to be on his route a number of towns, the names of which begin with the suggestive syllable "Kil." There was Kilmartin, and so on. In his ignorance of geographical nomenclature his affrighted senses were startled anew on hearing a fellow-passenger in the railway carriage remark to another as follows:

"I am just after bein' over to Kilpatrick."

"And I," replied the other, "am afther bein' over to Kilmday."

"What murderers they are!" thought the Englishman. "And to think that they talk of their assassinations so publicly!" But the conversation went on.

"I'm goin' home, and then to Killmore," was No. 2's reply. The Englishman's blood curdled.

"Kilmore, is it?" added No. 1. "You'd betther be comin' along wid me to Kilumaule." It is related that the Englishman left the train at the next station.

A Kiss on the Sly.

There is to be found much refreshment in a well-proportioned kiss. This much everybody acknowledges, though only a frank few have the courage to acknowledge it openly. As it is a curious fact, yet unexplained by the philosophers, that the slyer the kiss is the more is in it of refreshment.

A kiss that is paid as a forfeit before a whole room full of people is prosaic, not to say embarrassing. The girl laughs, which spoils the romance, and the fellow, ten to one, blushes—neither of them thinking much of it, and they are both apt pretty soon to forget all about it.

But let the same fellow kiss the same girl when nobody is looking, and the situation is as different as possible. That sort of a kiss, fired off in a hurry behind the door or in a conservatory, is like an electric shock, and is as sweet as cream. The taste of it sort of holds on and constantly suggests the propriety—or impropriety, as the case may be—of trying it again. And the laughing and blushing are exactly reversed. The fellow laughs without spoiling the romance a bit, and the girl blushes like a pink carnation.

It is queer that the very same thing should, under such slightly altered circumstances, be so entirely different, nor is it any the less queer because the difference has existed from the earliest age of the world.—Philadelphia Times.

Pat's Pledge.

Gough tells this story about an Irishman, to whom a physician said:

"Tim, this won't do; you must take warning from the fate of your friend, O'Shaughnessy. Only three nights ago he came home much soberer than you are, but in attempting to blow out a candle, his breath took fire, and he exploded—blew up—so his friends in three days have not been able to scrape enough of him together to hold a wake over."

"An' do you mane to tell me that he bust up," said Tim.

"Indeed I do, upon my honor."

Tim said he would take the pledge at once, and he said so in the following form:

"I swear never to blow out a candle while I am drunk again."

Get Out Doors.

The close confinement of all factory work gives the operatives pallid faces, poor appetite, languid, miserable feelings, poor blood, inactive liver, kidneys and urinary troubles, and all the physicians and medicine in the world cannot help them unless they get out of doors or use Hop Bitters, the purest and best remedy, especially for such cases, having abundance of health, sunshine and rosy cheeks in them. They cost but a trifle. See another column.—Christian Recorder.

"WELL," exclaimed Mrs. Goodington as she put down the glass of water in disgust, "perhaps they're right; maybe it isn't delirious to health, but it's unparable enough to the taste, goodness knows. It's perfectly contagious, and I'd as lief drink so much bulge water. Why can't they stop the collusion of that nasty Piggin Brook, I wonder; and I wonder, too, if swallowing elergy, as they call it, is wholesome. Guess if they had to drink it, themselves, instead of Apollo and Vicious water, they wouldn't think it wasn't delirious." And the old lady scowled an unwonted scowl at the "unparable" beverage that badly became her usually serene countenance. —Boston Transcript.

Fogg put his foot into it bodily when he was introduced to Mrs. Smith and her daughter. He wished to say something neat and gallant. Addressing the daughter, said he, "Really, madam, I never should have suspected that that lady was your daughter. I supposed, of course, that you were sisters; I did, I assure you." "Thank you, Mr. Fogg," replied Miss Smith. "You were perfectly right in thinking that lady could not be my daughter. She is my mother, sir." Fogg went off in a hurry, calling somebody or other a confounded fool, while Miss Smith was heard to remark, indignantly, "Sisters, indeed!"

Immigration Statistics.

The total immigration from 1820 to 1881 amounted to 10,808,189. The year 1820 is the genesis of our statistics, as previous to that time no statistics of immigration were officially kept. It is worthy of note that by far the greater part of the immigrants are men under forty years of age, or, in other words, of men who, if they remained in Europe, would be subject to military duty. It has been estimated by careful statisticians that, of the 10,808,189 immigrants who have come to the United States since 1820 up to June 30, 1881, Ireland and Germany have furnished over 3,000,000 each.

TORMENT, INDEED.

Life's vexations do not generally come all at once like a storm descending the mountain or like a whirlwind; they come as the rain does in some sections of the world—gently, but every day. One of life's discomforts is promoted, however, according to popular impression, by hot weather, mosquitoes and mad dogs all flourish at the same time and are chargeable to the malefic influence of the Dog Star. Speaking of dogs and the Dog Star reminds us of a boy's story of a dog and the sequel, and which we here give in a short extract from the boy's letter: "Golly, Bob, you ought to have been there last night to a-seen the fun. Tom Winkins' dorg Toddles was a-settin' at the gate a-gazin' at the Comit, when along comes old Sykes durned rat tarrier and the 2 waltzed over the fence and the 2 fought. The tarrier proved too much for Toddles, and afore they could haul him off the battle ground he had made a good square meal off his hide. Tom was in despair. A kind looking gentleman in a broad brim hat told him to get a bottle of ST. JACOBS OIL and rub him with it, and it would cure him in no time. What does Tom do but steal into the chapel at Vesper time and slide into Father Jacobs' confessional box and beg of him a bottle of his oil with which to rub his dorg. The Father felt of Tom's head; it was hot an' afore Tom could utter a prayer, two men were draggin' him home followed by a great crowd, who kept at a safe distance, thinking he had been bit by a mad dorg. The more he kicked and screamed to be let free, the tighter they held on to him." In reference to another torment, the Chicago Western Catholic recently wrote: "Mr. Joel D. Harvey, U. S. Collector of Internal Revenue, of this city, has spent over two thousand dollars on medicine for his wife, who was suffering dreadfully from rheumatism, and without deriving any benefit whatever; yet two bottles of ST. JACOBS OIL accomplished what the most skillful medical men failed in doing. We could give the names of hundreds who have been cured by this wonderful remedy did space permit us. The latest man who has been made happy through the use of this valuable liniment is Mr. James A. Conlan, librarian of the Union Catholic Library of this city. The following is Mr. Conlan's indorsement:

UNION CATHOLIC LIBRARY ASSOCIATION,
CHICAGO, Sept. 14, 1880.

I wish to add my testimony to the merits of ST. JACOBS OIL as a cure for rheumatism. One bottle has cured me of this troublesome disease, which gave me a great deal of bother for a long time; but, thanks to the remedy, I am cured. This statement is unsolicited by any one in its interest.

Very respectfully,
JAMES A. CONLAN, Librarian.

REPORTS from all parts of the country, show a slight increase of the amount of small-pox cases. This is especially the case in the larger towns. Great pains are taken, however, to keep it under control, and it will not likely become general.

SNOW fell at Cincinnati last week, to the depth of a foot or more. Trains were greatly delayed in consequence, but the people had a good time sleigh riding. At Indianapolis the snow was about six inches deep. Good sleighing is also reported in the eastern and middle states.

RAILWAY statistics for 1881 give a total of over 8,000 miles of road built in the United States, during the year. Rhode Island has the least number of miles of new road, having built but one and one-fourth miles. Texas does the best, having completed over fourteen hundred miles during the year. Indiana built 375 miles.

EXPLORATIONS in Yucatan, lead scientific men to believe that the writings found on the ruins in that country, have something in common with the ancient Chaldaic inscriptions in Egypt and Babylon. Some even claim that Yucatan furnished the people who settled those ancient countries. If this is so, it reverses all our previous ideas of the world's early history.

THE editor of the Critic, a Washington paper, has opened fire on Ex-Postmaster General James. James had claimed that Buel was one of the star-route thieves, and Buell replies as follows: "From the beginning of American history to the present time, no cabinet ever held such a creature as Thomas L. James. He is a weak, cowardly liar, one of those ingrained liars, whose mendacity seems born in the bone like hereditary syphilis, and, therefore, he naturally proceeded to perjury when he swore, 'upon information and belief,' that Thomas J. Brady had used, with one A. C. Buell, large sums of money to corrupt members of congress in order to secure a large and unjust appropriation for star mails routes. Thos. L. James committed as barefaced and as bald headed perjury as ever sent a felon to breaking stone. We know of our knowledge that James committed perjury. He was aware also that the epithet perjurer is actionable at law, and he therefore takes particular pains to say that Thomas L. James is a perjurer, a wicked, malicious, malignant bearer of false witness upon his oath, and with every opportunity of knowing that he was perjuring himself when he did it. If his accusation is true, we are subject to indictment by the grand jury, now in session. We either did what James swore we did, or Thomas L. James swore to a lie. We say he swore to a lie. We want to demonstrate this to the grand jury." The editorial proceeds to brand James as a professional blackmailer, perjurer, etc., then closes thus: "The perjurer cannot hand over his perjury along with his portfolio to the spotless man who comes after him. Our quarrel is not with the department, but with Thomas L. James."

Postmasters' Pay.

The Cincinnati Times-Star has the following on postmasters' salary: "The postoffice at Cleveland pays a salary of $3,400; Dayton and Columbus, $3,000 each; Toledo, $2,900; and so on. On the other hand, some offices pay a salary ridiculously small, as it is based on the number of letters sent. For instance the compensation, according to the latest government "Blue Book" of the postmaster at Chapman's Mills, Gallia county, was $1.25 per annum. At De La Palma, Brown county, it was $1.95; at Dry Creek, Ross county, $1.34; at George Lake, $1.37; at Huffman, Morgan county, $1.87; at Key, Belmont county, $1.87; at Lynx, Adams county, $1.91; at Noblesville, Noble county, $1.54; at Southworth, Allen county, $1.15; at Willow Brook, Coshocton county, 97 cents was paid; at Painter's Creek, Darke county, the aggregate for the year was 34 cents; at Pickereltown, Logan county, J. H. Green drew for his annual services, 7 cents; while at Linscott's, Athens county, Harry Linscott, postmaster, was rewarded with a salary for the year of 2 cents. And yet some people complain that government employes are too well paid.

FOR the benefit of our readers who did not see the original article, we reproduce the following tariff list from a recent number of the Detroit Free Press. Those who think the tariff costs the people nothing, will find this table a good one to figure on. Senator Morrill's commendation, in his recent speech, of the existing tariff as one "imposing much higher rates upon luxuries than upon necessaries," is sharply attacked by J. S. Moore, the "Parsee merchant," who says of it, in a letter to the New York Times:

There is the old adage that it takes a wise child to know his father. But I hope the senator will pardon me when I say that it seems difficult for him to know his own tariff children of 1861, and those that followed. He says, "imposing much higher rates upon luxuries than upon necessaries." I shall take the liberty to point out to the senator that such an assertion is not borne out in our tariff system. I will show the ad valorem rate paid in 1880 on a few articles of luxury and on some articles of prime necessity, and be judged by the result:

Articles of luxury.	Per cent.
Laces, cords, gimps and braids	35
Diamonds	10
Embroideries	35
Fancy articles	35
Richest kind of cut glass	40
Jewelry	25
Musical instruments	30
Champagne, in pints	47¼
Champagne, in quarts, $6 per doz	50
Still-wines, in bottles	32¼

Now, let me place against the above what I deem articles of necessity and see what duty they paid:

	Duties paid in 1880 calculated in ad valorem taken from official returns.
Articles of necessity.	Per cent.
Cleaned rice	95½
Epsom salts	78¼
Chiccory	102½
Spool thread	76¾
Window glass, common	from 58¾ to 75
Band and hoop iron	75
Boiler plates	60
Horseshoe nails	93
Locomotive tires	79½
Steel rails	99
Castor oil	148
Croton oil	136
Paris white	230
Balmoral alpaca	91
Blankets valued at 36½ cents per pound	80½
Woolen hosiery valued at 60 cts per pound	100¾

The tables need no comment.

IT is probable that the case of Gen. Fitz John Porter, will again be brought to the people's notice. Gen. Grant has written the president a lengthy letter, in which he regrets the injustice done to Porter, and suggests that the whole matter be laid before the attorney general. Grant is a power behind the throne, and it is very likely that something will be done. This is rather tardy justice for General Porter, since it has been about nineteen years coming about, he having been under the cloud of suspicion for that length of time. It is to be hoped that Gen. Grant was actuated by a just and honorable motive in his letter to the president, recommending a reconsideration of the case. Gen. Terry also, thinks that Gen. Porter has suffered injustice, and wishes to do what he can to relieve him.

Our Neighbors.

—Attorney General Baldwin has decided that county superintendents cannot appoint a deputy, and consequently they are not entitled to draw pay for one. Nor are they entitled to any pay for clerk hire.—South Bend Register.

—Albion New Era:—On Thursday of last week John W. Kline, north of town brought in a dandelion blossom which he found growing in the common. Wild flowers blooming between Christmas and New Years is some thing unusual in this latitude.

—The republicans in Wabash county are trying to decide as to the respective merits of primary elections and delegate conventions as a means for the nomination of candidates for office. The majority of those interviewed expressed a preference for delegate conventions.

An enthusiastic friend of the Hon. S. S. Shutt called at our office last week, and added his name to our list, owing to the fact that we mentioned the candidacy of Mr. Shutt for Congress. He says, "Herald it all over the district that Sam. Shutt is just the man for that place."—[Kendallville News.

—We clip the following from the Col. City Commercial: "W. R. Johnson, of Thorncreek township, informs us that in addition to keeping a large family he has, during the last year, on a farm of 50 acres, cleared over and above all expenses, $547.00. This is what we call successful farming."

—At the recent reunion of the veterans of the 44th, at Lagrange, the following officers were elected for the coming year: President, S. B. Sweet; vice-president, W. B. Bingham; secretary, Nicholas Ensley; treasurer, F. W. Willis. J. M. Kimsey, of Waterloo, is complimented for the quality of music furnished.

—The Bristol Banner has the following: "For the benefit of all and especially our clever friend of the White Pigeon Journal we will state in plain and unmistakable language that Bristol is perfectly free from small pox. There is not now a single case of small-pox or varioloid within the corporate limits of this town. Plain enough?

—A family named Calmer, living near Mishawaka watched out the old year, and a little after midnight were preparing to retire for the night. Mr. Calmer's son, a young man, was standing at the window when he was shot dead by some unknown person standing on the outside. At last accounts there was no clue to the perpetrator of the cowardly deed.

—Thad. Butler, so long connected with the Wabash Plain Dealer, has retired from its management. This is to be regretted as he has proved himself an able newspaper man. He states his reasons for this step in a frank statement that does him great credit. We part with him with regret, and hope he will be successful in whatever new enterprise he undertakes.

—The Edgerton Herald says: "On Monday night last an attempt was made to fire the building occupied by Stoll's saloon, which, had it proved a success, would have destroyed the greater portion of the business part of our town. The siding was ripped off and the hole thus made filled with kindling and a coffee sack, and lot of kerosene oil poured on, but for some reason the incendiary did not set fire to the pile."

—County Clerk Goodale issued 102 marriage licenses during the year 1881 which at $2.00 each, yielded him an income of $204. But if he could have added to it the legal fee for each of the scores of prospective benedicts who with their ducksies skipped across the line and had the connubial knot entwined on Michigan soil, the above sum would have been augmented to a very gratifying extent.—Angola Herald.

—F. P. Blair has resigned as day operator, and has purchased an interest in the Auburn Courier, where he intends going into business this week. Mr. Blair has been an operator at Wawaka station for the past 14 months, and has given good satisfaction in every respect. We can truly say that he is a steady, bright, intelligent young man, and he has our best wishes.—Wawaka correspondent in the Kendallville Standard.

The Kendallville Review says that the father of Mr. William Hill, of that city, was really the first inventor of the sewing machine. A year before Howe took out his patent, Mr. Hill, then living in Rochester, New York, constructed a machine that would sew, but before it was sufficiently completed to warrant an application for a patent, it was destroyed by fire, and the inventor not thinking it of much importance, never constructed another. He narrowly missed being a millionaire.—[Albion New Era.

—Wabash is putting up the poles for their system of telephones. It will require several hundred poles to complete the job.

—Speaking of their fair, the Fort Wayne News says: "The outlook now points to no Fair next fall. I have had some intercourse with members of the Board, and they are fixed in the determination to abandon their lease unless money can be raised for a permanent exposition building on the grounds of the Association. It is estimated that a suitable building will cost less than $3,000, and unless our people will raise that amount, there will be no exhibition. The society is tired of asking merchants to display their wares in an old barn, and has concluded not to do so again. It will be an unfortunate thing if the Fairs shall be discontinued; for they had become a source of large revenue to our merchants."

The Law.

AS ENACTED AND AMENDED BY THE LAST LEGISLATURE OF INDIANA.

GENERAL ELECTIONS.

All general elections under the new law are held every two years on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.

Voters are required to have resided in the state during the six months, in the township sixty days, and in the precinct where he votes thirty days, immediately preceeding the election. No one loses his residence as voter by reason of absence on business merely.

VOTING PLACES.

No voting precinct shall contain more than 350 voters, as near as may be, to be ascertained by returns of the last election, and to this end boards of county commissioners shall designate as many places of voting in each township as may be required to carry out this provision of limitation of number of voters to precincts.

KIND OF BALLOTS.

All ballots are required to be written or printed on plain white paper of a uniform width of three inches, and without any distinguishing mark.

TOWNSHIP ELECTIONS.

Township elections shall be held on the first Monday of April, 1882, and every second year thereafter, for the purpose of electing justices of the peace, township trustees, assessors, constables and such other township officers as are provided for by law. The foregoing provisions of the general election law governs the townships and all special electons also. Persons composing election boards, the same as under old law, are allowed $2 per day each.

OIL INSPECTION.

Any one selling or using oil for illuminating purposes which has not been duly inspected by the oil inspector, is liable to heavy fines. This does not apply to sperm oil.—[Indiana Farmer.

School Fund Apportionment.

We are indebted to Auditor Robbins for a copy of the January apportionment of schools. The total amount divided to the different counties is $861,844.00, being $1.20 for each child in the state between the ages of 6 and 21. DeKalb county pays into the state in taxes and interest on school funds, $6,133.10; and receives as her share of the total fund $8,499.60. Counties generally receive more from the state than they pay in. Crawford county pays in the least, which is $1,105.76; and draws out five times that amount, $5,368.80. Marion county pays the most and receives the most. It pays $43,861.92 and gets back $45,796.80 Lagrange is the nearest even. She pays $6,037.54 and receives $6,138.00. The following are the counties that pay to the state in taxes and interest on school funds, more than they get back: Benton, Carroll, Clinton, Decatur, Fayette, Gibson, Hancock, Hendricks, Henry, Johnson, Montgomery, Parke, Putnam, Rush, Shelby, Tippecanoe, Union, Vermillion and Warren.

The Indiana Farmer.

This old and reliable paper begins the new year with a still better prospect than ever before. Among its contributors for the coming year, we notice the names of R. T. Brown, Prof. Atwater, Frank Dougherty and Hon. Cassius M. Clay, of Kentucky. All these will furnish articles during the year. Add to this the usual amount of editorial matter and what promises to be an increased amount of correspondence, and we have in the Farmer, one of the best home papers in the country.

> "How doth the little busy Becks
> Improve each shining hour,
> And freeze unto the milliners
> With seventeen-horse power?"

There would have been more stanzas no doubt, but just at this point the poet had to go out and dig some green wood out of the snow, so as to boil more thoroughly two similar sticks already in the stove, and taking advantage of his absence the muses fled.

—At a meeting of stock holders of the First National Bank in this place last Tuesday, the following officers were elected: President, Guy Plum; Vice-president, C. A. O. McClellan; Cashier, Wm. McIntyre; Directors, E. Barry, Jas. I. Best, C. L. Lace, J. H. Ford, C. A. O. McClellan, J. E. Shilling and Guy Plum. —Schools in this township are progressing finely, and the trustee keeps his eye on the work.

—George May's little girl was very sick last week, supposed to be the result of vaccination. The doctor was called, but it is hoped the sickness is not dangerous.

—B. F. Blair is making things comfortable for his guests, and it would surprise many who are not familiar with the place to see what amount of business a hotel has in our little town.

—There is a great deal of excitement about here in regard to small-pox, and all sorts of rumors are afloat. Many of the people are having their children vaccinated, but some are still delaying the matter as they are afraid the children will take cold and be obliged to quit school.

—Institute was in session here Friday and Saturday, and many of our citizens were in attendance, and an unusual interest was manifested. A fine entertainment was given by the teachers and scholars on Friday evening, at the Christian church. It consisted of declamations, songs, music, etc. Speeches were also made by Mr. Bonnell and Supt. J. A. Barns. The pieces given were generally good. The song by little Miss Ashelman was particularly fine and did her and her teachers great credit. But the cutest little piece was the song by the little Rodarmer girl, who was too young to speak plain, yet she went through the long piece without faltering. All the teachers were present. They are: D. G. Belt, Emma and Mary Young, Ellen Jackson, Ellen Joslin and C. H. Husselman.

EDITORS COURIER:—I have a word to say in regard to the Medical men of Auburn, or a part of them at least. Last Tuesday night, Hayden Cobler, living about five miles southeast of Auburn, was taken very sick with what proved to be a congestive chill. His wife being very much frightened, and not having any medicine in the house, sent one of his neighbors to Auburn for a doctor, and I am informed that he called upon five different ones, but could prevail on none of them to come. I believe the roads were too bad for some of them, and others objected on account of fears in regard to pay; as Mr. Cobler had been owing some doctor bills, and had failed to pay—also had promised to haul one of them some tamarack wood, and had failed to do that. Such excuses! Well, the consequences are the man died the next morning at eight o'clock.

Now, I don't say that he could have been saved if all the doctors in Auburn had been there, but the probabilities are that if he could have had medical aid in time he could have been; and I wish to ask, was it christianity, was it humanity, on the part of the doctors to refuse on such pleas as they gave? Are the rich and prosperous only to be doctored? Must a man die for want of medical aid, because he has been unfortunate and could not always meet his obligations just as he should?

THE will of William F. Weld, who died recently at Philadelphia, covers an estate of $21,000,000, the bulk of which goes to four grandchildren. The widow and daughters are given annuities of $20,000, and two sons will receive $500,000 each.

IN a six-days' walking match at New York, Fitzgerald came in first with a record of 582 miles and fifty-five yards, beating the best previous record (that of Robert Vint, 578 miles, in May, 1881) by four miles and a few yards.... The total number of deaths from small-pox in New York last year was 450, and from scarlet fever, 1,961. This is 419 more deaths from small-pox than in 1880, and an excess of 531 cases of scarlet fever. The record of all classes of contagious diseases shows a great increase over the record for 1880.... New York reports for the year the erection of nearly 2,500 buildings, at a cost of $47,000,000. ....By the burning of a boarding house at Richburg, N. Y., Gilbert Abers and wife were seriously burned, and their three children perished in the flames.

BY the breaking of a bridge over the Kennebunk river a passenger train on the Boston and Maine railroad was precipitated down a high embankment, and, the cars taking fire, a scene of horror occurred. Out of the 100 passengers very few escaped unhurt. One was killed, one fatally wounded, three seriously hurt, and sixty others bruised and injured.... Oscar Wilde, the English æsthete, who arrived in New York last week by the Arizona, is 26 years of age and six feet four inches in height. He says he came to lecture and see the country, and will not return to England until he does.

WASHINGTON BUTCHERS' SONS, of Philadelphia, have settled with their creditors at the rate of 40 per cent. Mr. Darlington, the head of the Chicago branch, has retired.

THE WEST.

THE railroads terminating in Chicago make a good showing of the year's business. The Northwestern reports earnings of $21,788,886, and the completion of 468 miles of new track. The gross revenues of the Rock Island are placed at $12,500,000, and a large elevator was built in Chicago. The Burlington shows earnings of nearly $23,000,000, and 200 miles of track have been constructed. The St. Paul reports gross revenues of $16,740,100, and it has built 200 miles of road.... Mrs. Cruz, living at Florence, Los Angeles county, Cal., gave birth to six female children. ....Small-pox has been reported from thirty-seven towns and villages in Illinois, in most of which the epidemic is under control.

H. CRENSHAW, a saloon proprietor of Kansas City, was arrested for beating his wife. He turned upon Officer Hynes, the oldest member of the police force, and fired four shots, killing him in the street. The officer succeeded in inflicting a mortal wound upon his murderer.

AT San Francisco, Cal., a clerk named Reed, rendered temporarily insane by close application to work, shot and killed his mother-in-law, fatally wounded his daughter, and then killed himself....The receipts for the single performance of the "Messiah" at Cincinnati, with Patti as the principal attraction, were $12,448.

NEAR Louisiana, Mo., John Morgan Shaw, one of Bill Anderson's guerrillas, was shot and killed by his brother, Morgan Shaw. The murder arose from a family feud about the division of the father's property. In May, 1880, John Morgan Shaw shot and killed his brother, Perrin Shaw, and this second tragedy is the result of the first.

THE SOUTH.

GABRIEL WHITE, a negro, was hanged in Walterboro for the murder of Frederick Bellinger, another negro, in 1878. William Henry Erb was hanged at St. Louis for the murder of his wife. A triple hanging at Mansfield, La., was forestalled by the recent escape of the condemned men from the jail at Shreveport.

A NEGRO from Cairo infected the whole town of Milan, Tenn., with small-pox. Nearly twenty cases are under treatment, and two pest-houses have been established.

THE perpetrators of the recent terrible tragedy at Ashland, Ky., have been arrested, and they have made a full confession. Their names are William Neal, Ellis Craft and George Ellis, all white. The strangest part of the story is that all three of the men were present at the burning of the house, which they had set on fire to conceal their crime; that one of them drove the hearse at the funeral of the three victims, and another acted as pall-bearer.... A frightful tragedy was lately enacted near Minden, La. Robert Lewis, son of the late Judge Landon Lewis, and brother of Will S. Lewis, shot Mrs. Will S. Lewis and her sister, Mrs. Thompson, both severely, and then killed himself. The cause of the tragedy is unknown.

Another officer came to his relief and was instantly killed. They then fled with the wounded jailer, and were pursued for 300 yards by the citizens, the murderers being killed in the battle. Two of the citizens were wounded.

DR. BOYNTON, who so faithfully watched by the bedside of President Garfield, has refused to take any remuneration whatever for his services. He also refused to take anything for his services during the illness of Mrs. Garfield, and returned a $1,000 check which Gen. Garfield had sent him therefor.

DUN, WIMAN & CO.'s mercantile agency reports the business failures throughout the country for the week ending Dec. 30 at 151, which is lower than the preceding week, but fully up to the highest average which has been maintained for some months past. The distribution is as follows: Western States, 39; Southern, 46; Middle, 27; Eastern, 15; Pacific, 8; New York city, 18.

GEN. GRANT has recently reached the conclusion that Gen. Fitz John Porter was deeply wronged by dismissal from the army, and he will address an earnest appeal to President Arthur for the prompt restoration of the disgraced officer.

ARTICLES of incorporation have been prepared for the Gulf and Pacific Railway Company, which proposes to construct about 1,150 miles of track from New Orleans to Isleta, New Mexico. The House Committee on Elections will, it is said, decide that neither Cannon nor Campbell are entitled to the Utah seat in Congress.

A THOROUGH reconciliation seems to have taken place between President Arthur and Collector Robertson, and it is said that the candidacy of the latter for Governor of New York is looked upon with favor by the Chief Magistrate.

WASHINGTON.

CONGRESSMAN HENDERSON, of Illinois, is determined to push his or some other Inter-State Commerce bill through Congress this session if possible. He says legislation of the character indicated is absolutely necessary, not only for producers and traders, but for railroad stockholders. He points to the growing abuse under which a few rich speculators, desirous of controlling certain railroads, inaugurate a war of rates against such roads in order to depreciate the stock that they may purchase at cheaper rates. He thinks that for the protection of the stockholders and the producers and traders a minimum as well as a maximum freight rate should be fixed.... A rumor is floating about the court-room at Washington that one of the jurors has expressed the opinion that Guiteau is as mad as a March hare.

THE attention of Congress is about to be called to the irregularities in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency in winding up insolvent national banks. It is alleged that exorbitant fees have been allowed to receivers and attorneys, and that one bank in New York has been favored with the sale of all bonds belonging to wrecked institutions.

CONGRESSMAN HERBERT, of Alabama, recently introduced a bill, now in the hands of the House Judiciary Committee, which, if passed, will completely revolutionize the present system of paying United States District Attorneys. THE GUITEAU TRIAL.

THIRTY-FOURTH DAY.

The prisoner was taken without demonstration to the prisoner's dock, which is located some twenty-five feet from the counsel, upon the left of the room. A letter written by the prisoner to Don Cameron, asking for the sum of $500, was submitted by the defense as evidence of insanity. The letter is as follows:

Hon. Don Cameron:

DEAR SIR: I am on trial for my life and I need money. I am a stalwart of the stalwarts, and so are you. You think a great deal of Gen. Arthur, and so do I. My inspiration made him President, and I am going to ask you to let me have $500. If I get out of this I will return it. If not, charge it to the stalwarts.

Yours for our cause, and very cordially,
(Signed) CHARLES GUITEAU.

P. S.—Please give your check to my brother, J. W. Guiteau, of Boston, and make it payable to my order. C. G.

When the letter was produced in court, the prisoner denounced his brother as a nuisance and Scoville as a jackass.

Dr. Callender, who occupied the witness stand, was then asked by Scoville: "Will you give your opinion whether such a letter as that, written to a man he didn't know, does not indicate unsoundness of mind?"

Answer—"I don't think it indicates unsoundness of mind. It seems to me consistent with his character and habit through life of soliciting money from sources where he had no reason to expect it."

Dr. Walter Kempster, Superintendent of the Wisconsin State Hospital for the Insane, had devoted his attention to the study of insanity for the past fifteen years. Witness was familiar with the process of taking the conformity of the head, and did not believe much importance, as a rule, could be attached to the shape of the head in determining the question of sanity or insanity. Witness exhibited slips showing the shape, as taken by the "conformitor," of the heads of a number of gentlemen.

Witness related incidents within his knowledge of persons who had committed crimes while acting under the influence of insane delusions, and defined what he considered insane delusions to be.

Witness was then asked if he had ever seen a case where a person committed crime and claimed divine inspiration, and if so, how such persons deported themselves before and after the act. He replied that in such cases the delusion (or inspiration as they claim it to be) comes to the person suddenly and with intense pressure, and that such persons act quickly and upon sudden impulse, delaying neither to consider opportunity or weapons; that it would be impossible to conceive, without actually witnessing it, the energy and impetuosity and determination with which persons acting under an insane delusion carry out their purposes; that it would be equally impossible to describe it with language.

Guiteau—"You don't agree with Abraham, Doctor. He took plenty of time to make his arrangements."

Witness stated that he did not believe in a distinct type of insanity which could be called moral insanity. It was simply a convenient term which had been invented to excuse the commission of heinous crimes. Witness had never seen a case where an insane man, after committing a crime, paraded his insanity and urged it as an excuse for his crime. Insane murderers do not boast of their acts, but, on the contrary, very rarely allude to them unless a good deal of ingenuity is used to draw them out. Witness, until he entered this court-room, had never heard of a case of alleged inspiration that came from within. Always such persons claim to have heard the voice of God or seen His image or something of that sort. Such inspiration is never a conviction arrived at after mature reflection on the part of the person so affected.

Witness had visited the jail and examined the prisoner with a view of determining his mental condition. The witness detailed at some length conversations he had with the prisoner, with occasional contradictions by Guiteau.

The witness had asked the prisoner if he thought he was insane, and his reply was: "Not what you experts call insane; but legally insane." When asked what he meant by that term, the prisoner had said that if he could get a jury to believe he was acting under an inspiration from the Lord when he shot the President, that would be all he wanted, and would acquit him.

Guiteau had been engaged with his mail for some minutes, and here called out: "I would like to have you know, ladies and gentlemen, that my letters now come addressed, 'The Hon. Charles Guiteau,' quite a change from last summer."

The witness was cross-examined by Reed, who produced a pamphlet, a report prepared by the witness as Superintendent of the Wisconsin Insane Asylum, and read extracts from it. During the reading a dispute arose between counsel, who seemed to have gradually developed a vast amount of bitterness.

Guiteau shouted from the dock: "I want it understood that Judge Porter is making all this fuss and interruption simply to divert the minds of the jury from the point which he sees that Reed has made against him. It simply shows a contemptible meanness that only such fellows as he and Corkhill can indulge in."

"He came here," said Guiteau, "as an expert for the defense. That's what he said when he was in my cell. But good living at Willard's and Corkhill's money have been too much for him."

Judge Cox, in rendering a decision on the application of Col. Corkhill to place Guiteau in the prisoners' dock, explained why he had given the assassin such latitude heretofore. He did not wish even to appear to deprive the prisoner of any of his constitutional guarantees. He wished also to give the jury and the experts an opportunity of judging for themselves whether Guiteau was insane or not, and for that reason gave the prisoner more latitude than he would otherwise allow. He decided that the prisoner should be placed in the dock, because he was manifestly abusing the privileges granted to him.

THIRTY-FIFTH DAY.

As the assassin was led into court by the bailiffs, he passed a moment at the table where his counsel sat and whispered to Scoville: "If you will only keep quiet to-day I will laugh this case out of court." As soon as he reached the dock he shouted out: "Some leading papers in America consider me the greatest fellow they have met in some time. At 5 o'clock last night I received a telegram, which I will read for the edification of this audience and the American people:

"Mr. Charles J. Guiteau, Washington, D. C.:

"All Boston sympathizes with you. You ought to be President.

(Signed) "A HOST OF ADMIRERS."

Pausing a moment, he branched off into a rambling harangue, quoting scripture, and comparing himself to the "meek and lowly Jesus," who used plain language, though sometimes severe. "I have been accused of using too harsh language," he added, "but I take my pattern from the Savior of mankind. I shall submit my name to the next National Republican Convention. I shall expect to be before it. There are only two men in the country who want me hung. One is Judge Porter, who expects to get $5,000 from the Government if I am convicted, and the other is Corkhill, who expects to get bounced, and who knows I am the cause of it."

Dr. Kempster took the stand and Scoville resumed his cross-examination.

Witness did not believe in temporary insanity in the sense that persons could be insane and wholly recover from it in an hour.

Upon the witness leaving the stand Corkhill announced that he had but one more witness to introduce on the part of the Government.

Scoville replied: "We have some witnesses whose names have been presented since we closed our case, and I shall ask the court to permit us to have them sworn, and our reason will be upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence material to the case."

Davidge—"Could you give us an idea how much time you will want upon surrebuttal?"

Scoville—"Several days; probably all of next week."

Davidge—"We must object, your Honor, to a reopening of this case."

Scoville insisted that he did not desire to delay the trial or consume the time of the court, but the prosecution had consumed weeks with these expert witnesses, meeting with them nightly and conferring with them in preparation of this case, and he did not propose to be cut short in the matter of time. He would renew, however, his proposition that the jury be allowed to separate and go to their homes, relying upon their honor and integrity.

The question of permitting the jury to disband was dismissed by the foreman announcing that they preferred not to separate, provided that they could have reasonable opportunity for exercise and to obtain fresh air.

Corkhill proceeded to reply to what he termed counsel's aspersions upon the "distinguished medical gentlemen who did honor to their States."

Scoville replied to Corkhill, and surprised every one by making one of the best and most impressive speeches that has been heard in the court-room since the opening of the trial.

Some manifestation of applause followed the conclusion of his speech, but it was quickly checked by the court.

Dr. John P. Gray, Medical Superintendent of the New York State Lunatic Asylum, took the stand. Witness had made the study of insanity his business since 1850, and in that time had treated or investigated 12,000 cases of insanity. He had never seen a single instance where the only indication of insanity was an exhibition of immorality or wickedness. He did not believe in what had been called "moral insanity." It was impossible to discover mental unity so as to locate the impairment of moral nature that was not accompanied by intellectual deterioration. Insanity in itself had no more tendency to excite to crime than neuralgia or any other disease. It puts nothing new into a man's nature; it only perverts what is already there.

Dr. Gray stated that he had made a thorough, complete and satisfactory examination of the prisoner at the jail, and gave at some length the details of his examination and conversation with the prisoner. Witness asked the prisoner the question: "Suppose the President had offered the Paris Consulship during the time you were reflecting upon the subject of removing him, would you still have shot him?" and he replied: "Well, that would have settled the matter. I should have taken the position."

Guiteau called out from the dock: "I said if he had offered it to me at any time before the 1st of June. If he had offered it after the 1st of June it would not have made the slightest difference."

Witness asked prisoner how he came to shoot the President, and his reply was: "I came to the conclusion the political situation justified it. I gradually became convinced of this, and I resolved upon his removal."

Guiteau shouted again: "That knocks your Paris Consulship, and shows there was no malice in it—not an element of murder in it, but political necessity."

Witness then inquired of the prisoner in regard to his alleged inspiration, and asked him if it came to him in the form of a voice, or vision, or direct command, and his reply was: "No, it came into my head, a conception, and I reflected upon it until I resolved that it was justified by the situation."

Witness then asked the prisoner how this statement accorded with his theory of inspiration, and his reply was: "The inspiration was in the form of pressure constantly upon me to commit the act."

Guiteau—"That's all there is to the case, short and to the point. You can talk about it six years if you want to."

THIRTY-SIXTH DAY.

At the opening of court Guiteau called out: "One of my guards here, Cunningham, has got an eleven-pound baby for a New Year's present." [Laughter, in which the jury heartily joined.]

Dr. Gray resumed the story of his conversation with the prisoner in jail.

Guiteau continually interjected comments, and with Scoville's frequent objections witness soon became sensibly disturbed, and, when asked to go on, said: "There have been so many interruptions I don't know where I am."

Guiteau quickly retorted: "I shouldn't think you did, nor any one else. I have been trying all the morning to find out where you are. The fact is, you are badly lost this morning, doctor. We will have to send a small boy to find you."

Witness did not find a single circumstance, as narrated by the prisoner, that would indicate to his (witness') mind insanity. He was of opinion, judging by his examination of the prisoner in the jail, and from his observation of him in court, that he is sane at this time.

Corkhill then read the lengthy hypothetical question of the prosecution.

Guiteau suggested that there was no necessity to repeat that bosh, as everybody had heard it a dozen times. The suggestion was unheeded, and the prisoner added: "Two-thirds of that is false, and it makes me mad every time I hear it read."

As the reading proceeded he continually called out: "That is false!" "All false!" "How do you know?" "That's Smith's lie!" and similar expressions.

Guiteau shouted: "The whole substratum of that thing is false. How can the doctor give a truthful answer?"

Witness then gave at great length full details of what he had observed in the conduct and sayings of the prisoner in the court that led him (witness) to believe in his sanity. Referring to the prisoner's claim that the Deity inspired the act, he was interrupted by Guiteau, who called out: "Yes, and He'll take care of it, too, Dr. Gray. I'll stake my life on it."

Witness was asked: "Do you think the prisoner has been feigning in court?"

And replied: "Yes, I do. He claims an inspiration from the Deity. I don't believe that he believes any such thing, and in such a sense he is feigning and acting a part."

Guiteau—"No such thing. I never feign. You are paid for your opinion; the jury is not."

Scoville began cross-examination. Witness was asked if he had testified as expert in cases of persons on trial for capital crimes, but before he could reply Guiteau supplemented the question by calling out: "How many men have you helped to hang?"

Witness was not aware of a case where he had pronounced a sane man insane, or where he had adjudged an insane man sane. He admitted, however, that his views upon some types of insanity had changed since he began to study the subject.

Guiteau—"You live to learn, then, like other people. If you live twenty years longer you may know something about insanity. You may reach the Abrahamic type by that time. You are a growing man, doctor."

Witness stated that he abandoned the theory of "moral insanity" as far back as 1854. He did not think it would be found in his reports subsequent to that date as a distinct classification.

After some further questions on this subject, Guiteau broke out impatiently: "The amount of it is, these experts will swear to anything for money. They will swear to things to-day they would not have thought of swearing to twenty-five years ago, or would swear to twenty-five years hence. This subject of insanity is a progressive one."

Witness was asked how he came to visit Washington to testify in this case, and replied: "I did not care to come, but the President of our board said he thought it my duty to come."

Scoville—"Then you came on his interpretation of your duty?"

Guiteau added: "How about Corkhill's money? I guess that was the influence that brought you here. This fellow Corkhill has got a bunghole in the treasury that will run out $100,000 before he gets through with this case. It's about time President Arthur was attending to his case. I wouldn't let him stay here a week if I were President. However, I'll attend to Corkhill in 1884."

Scoville endeavored to force an acknowledgment from witness that the conversation and conduct of the patient were the chief means of determining sanity or insanity.

Witness insisted it was only an incident, and not an essential element in the determination.

Scoville—"Why, you don't have any other means when they are alive, do you? You can't get at the brain to examine it, can you?"

Guiteau—"The experts on this case want to kill the man and then examine his brain afterward."

He was asked if he had ever seen any case of feigned insanity that resembled that of the prisoner (assuming that he is feigning) and replied: "I have not seen any such insanity, real or feigned."

The hour of adjournment having arrived, Guiteau, who had been listlessly following the proceedings, called out: "To-morrow will be New Year's, 1882. I shall receive to-morrow in jail, and shall be happy to see all who can succeed in getting in. I wish every one a happy New Year. Come, Scoville, it's 3 o'clock, let's go home."

The court adjourned till Tuesday.

THIRTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Guiteau opened court by announcing that he had many New-Year callers, none of whom wanted him hanged, and all of whom believed he would be acquitted.

Dr. Gray took the stand, and Scoville resumed the cross-examination. Witness had not, in giving his opinion on the direct examination that the prisoner was sane, taken into account the evidence of the prisoner himself, but taking that element into consideration his opinion would still be the same—that the prisoner is sane, and was sane on the 2d of July.

Witness did not believe in what is termed by some writers "emotional insanity," or "moral insanity." "Kleptomania," he considered simply thieving; "dipsomania," drunkenness, and "pyromania," incendiarism. These designations were simply convenient terms which had been invented to cover certain crimes. "Insanity," said the witness, "is never transmitted any more than cancer."

Scoville desired to put in evidence certain tabulated statements from the annual reports of witness. From these it appeared that of fifty-four cases of homicides by insane people, seven were by persons acting under an insane delusion of divine authority for their acts. At the request of the District Attorney witness described briefly these cases and added, "each case was one of marked insanity, independent of the homicidal act."

Dr. Gray was asked a few more questions by Scoville, when the District Attorney announced the conclusion of the examination on the part of the Government.

Dr. Bowker, of Kansas City, was called by Scoville. The witness met Mrs. Dunmire at Leadville, Col., and conversed with her. She said "she had entertained grave doubts as to the mental condition of Guiteau at the time she obtained her divorce, and thought at the time she had better defer the divorce proceedings, and await some further developments in the mental condition of her husband."

Clark Mills, the sculptor, was called for the purpose of identifying the plaster cast of Guiteau's head. At the first question, "Did you make a plaster cast of the prisoner's head?" Davidge objected to any reopening of the question of insanity, such as would be involved by the identification of the cast by this witness. The question of insanity had been gone over direct and in rebuttal. The prosecution had already admitted the genuineness of the cast. That was all that could be asked by the defense.

After further arguments, the court ruled against Scoville, and the witness was withdrawn.

The prisoner undertook to read a letter, as he claimed, from an old friend of President Garfield, in Ohio, showing that public opinion was making in his favor.

Judge Cox—"Be silent. Public opinion has nothing to do with this case."

Guiteau—"When I speak, I speak to 50,000,000 people, not to this little crowd in this court-room."

Guiteau—I've got through.

The Marshal whispered some instructions to the bailiff sitting in the dock. A moment later the prisoner started upon another harangue, and the bailiff put his hand upon his shoulder and attempted to quiet him.

Guiteau—"Get away from me or I'll slap you in the mouth."

With this outburst he subsided, however, and turned his attention to writing autographs.

Scoville again brought up the question of introducing new witnesses, and, after argument, an agreement was made that the defense submit a motion in writing to-morrow, giving the names of witnesses and the facts to be testified to, and supported by affidavit, giving the reason why such witnesses were not introduced before.

THIRTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Scoville, counsel for the defense, offered a motion for the admission of further evidence to prove the insanity of the prisoner.

Dr. McFarland, of Illinois, was to prove from what he had read in the papers that Guiteau was insane, and some Government detectives were to testify to the same from interviews held with him soon after the assassination. Other witnesses would declare that he had acted in a crazy manner a few days before he committed the crime, and Dr. Beard, of New York, was ready to swear that the assassin was crazy. After a good deal of discussion on the part of Scoville, Corkhill and Davidge, Judge Cox ruled against the admission of evidence of insanity in sur-rebuttal. J. J. Brooks, Chief of the Treasury Secret Service, was then called as a witness, and gave the details of an interview with the prisoner on the night of the shooting. The prosecution then submitted to the court the points for the instruction of the jury. During the reading of them, Judge Davidge was frequently interrupted by the assassin. They are as follows:

1. The legal test of responsibility, where insanity is set up as a defense for an alleged crime, is whether the accused, at the time of committing the act alleged, knew the difference between right and wrong in respect to such act; hence, in the present case, if the accused at the time of committing the act charged knew the difference between right and wrong in respect of such act; that is, if he knew what he was doing and that what he was doing was contrary to the law of the land, he is responsible.

Guiteau—"I didn't, because my free agency was destroyed."

2. If the accused knew what he was doing, and that what he was doing was contrary to the law of the land, it constitutes no defense, even if it were true that when he committed the act he really believed he was thereby producing a public benefit or carrying out an inspiration of divine origin or approval, such belief would not afford an excuse, nor would such excuse be afforded by the fact that in the commission of the act he was impelled by a depraved moral sense, whether innate or acquired, or by evil passion or indifference to moral obligation.

Guiteau—"All of which is false."

3. Insanity would, however, constitute a defense if by reason of the disease assumed, at the time of committing the act charged, did not know what he was doing, or, if he did know it, that what he was doing was contrary to law.

Guiteau—"I had no choice in the matter."

4. The only evidence in the present case tending to show an irresistible impulse to commit the homicide is the claim of the accused that his free agency was destroyed by his alleged conviction that the death of the President was required for the good of the American people and was divinely inspired; but such conviction, even if it really existed, could not afford any excuse when the party knew what he was doing and that it was contrary to law—no mere delusion or error of judgment, not even a fixed belief that what is prohibited by law is commanded or approved by divine authority—

Guiteau—"God's law is higher than man's law."

—can exempt the accused from responsibility for breaking the law. To have such an effect the commission of the act charged must have been the result of an insane delusion which was the product of disease, and such force as to deprive the accused of a degree of reason necessary to distinguish between right and wrong in respect of the act, so that at the time of committing the act he either did not know what he was doing, or, if he did, that the act was wrong or contrary to the law of the land.

Scoville announced to the court that the case of the defense was closed, and the court adjourned for three days, in order to allow counsel time for the preparation of their arguments.

A wall between many friendships is built of frozen stone.

ADDITIONAL NEWS.

THE full bench of the Supreme Court of Kansas, in passing upon an agreed case, has made a decision which will invalidate nearly all the laws passed by the Legislature of that State in 1877 and 1879. The ground of the decision was that the act was passed with the aid of the votes of four members who were not legally elected. Among the laws thus made void is the prohibition constitutional amendment.

THE Sub-Treasurer at San Francisco found his vaults so completely filled with silver that he refused to receive any more from the Collector of the port. The Secretary of the Treasury ordered the continued receipt of silver, and will ask Congress for an appropriation for additional storage capacity.

THE three men in custody as the perpetrators of the fearful tragedy at Ashland, Ky., were removed from Catlettsburg to Maysville for greater security against impending action by a mob. The law officers managed to slip their prisoners on board a river steamer, and get them away before anybody knew what was afoot. When the citizens heard of it they seized another steamer and gave chase, but finally relinquished the pursuit on ascertaining that a detachment of militia was on board with the prisoners, and that any attempt to get possession would be resisted by force of arms. Finally, the three prisoners were safely housed in the jail at Maysville, where it is believed they can be held secure against the designs of the would-be lynchers.

FORTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

Congress reassembled, after the holiday recess, on Thursday, Jan. 5. The Senate roll-call showed fifty-one members of that body present. A number of executive communications were laid before the Senate, and numerous petitions were presented for legislation regulating inter-State commerce, and for increased pay to the life-saving service. On motion of Mr. Garland, the Finance Committee was directed to inquire into the expediency of refunding the fees paid under the trade-mark legislation, which has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Mr. Anthony introduced a bill to promote the efficiency of the navy, and Mr. Maxey presented one to increase the value of the signal service. In the House, Mr. Orth rose to a question of privilege, stating that it grew out of and affecting the recent appointment of the committees of the House. Before stating the point specifically, he said: "I ask indulgence to announce that it is my purpose at an early day to introduce for consideration a proposition to change the method of selecting committees. The vast and diversified interests of the country are all more or less affected by Congressional legislation, and this legislation, as is well known, is almost exclusively controlled by the action of the committees. For this reason their formation assumes importance, and is invested with a responsibility too great to rest in the hands of a single individual, however capable and honest and patriotic such individual may be. As now exercised, it is emphatically one man's power, and such power is always dangerous and in conflict with the principles of our republican government. It is our duty to see that it may not at some future period be used to the detriment of the best interests of the people." Mr. Orth then made a strong protest against the treatment he had received from Speaker Keifer, and closed by asking that he be excused from serving on the Committee on Rules. The Speaker said: "The chair does not understand that it is necessary for him to vindicate himself by saying anything in reply. It must not, however, be inferred, because the chair does not undertake to challenge the statements charging him with injustice, that the chair acquiesces in the views taken by the gentleman from Indiana" (Orth). Orth's request was granted, and he was excused from further service on the Committee on Rules. A bill was introduced by Mr. Hawk, of Illinois, providing for the labeling of oleomargarine and other imitations of butter with their true name. Mr. Hawk also introduced a bill to reorganize the militia. Mr. Hewitt caused the adoption of a resolution of thanks to the Khedive of Egypt for the gift of Cleopatra's needle.

GEN. LEE is said to have asked a straggler, whom he found eating green persimmons, if he did not know they were unfit for food. "I'm not eating them for food, General," replied the man. "I'm eating them to draw up my stomach to fit my rations."

THE TARIFF.

Arguments Which Protectionists Furnish to England.

Senator Beck has received a letter from ex-Gov. Seymour, directing his attention to the effect that the policy of protection is likely to have upon the policy of foreign nations in their dealings with us. Touching this question Senator Beck said to a correspondent at Washington the other day:

The taunts of the advocates of protection and restriction that we who advocate a revenue tariff are working in the interest of English free-traders, and that our policy would tend to destroy or to cripple American industries, are absurd. We could with far more justice charge that they have entered into a conspiracy with the landed aristocracy of Great Britain to break down the great measures which the people of that country, in the interest of labor and cheap exchange of products all over the world, have extorted from the privileged classes after years of struggle. Every protectionist is to that extent a prohibitionist. He insists that each nation ought, as far as possible, to exclude the products of every other nation in order to protect home production. He taunts England, whose people buy 55 per cent. of all our exports, with allowing our wheat, pork, beef, butter, cheese and other products of our farms to enter her ports duty free. He says to the English "Fair Trader:"

"Discriminate against us if you are wise. Protect your home industries. No country or system of government can succeed that allows free competition."

The American protectionist makes war on our export trade. His theory carried into effect tends to the ruin of our farmers while protecting manufacturers. Those laws of England which give us an equal chance with her own colonists in her markets he in effect denounces, and it is to be remembered that all his arguments are heard and weighed as intelligently in Europe as they are here. A system that is enforced here and lauded as the best for this country must be, they might say abroad, the best for other countries. If the arguments and deductions of our protectionists should prevail in England, what would be the effect upon us? To illustrate: Leaving out of the question all her great colonial possessions in India, Australia and elsewhere, and her dependencies all over the world, England has great colonies on this continent whose people are entitled to her protection, if protection and restriction are to be again resorted to as true national policy.

I went to Winnipeg last summer and there saw a thriving city of 15,000 people, with a railroad about finished to Lake Superior. It was being pushed with great energy and abundant means westward to the Pacific ocean to reach the trade of Australia, China, Japan and the Indies on English soil, with cheap ships ready to furnish free goods for transportation over this continent to Europe. I went west of Winnipeg nearly 200 miles on that road and saw thousands and thousands of acres of wheat, clearing forty bushels to the acre, weighing sixty-three and sixty-five pounds to the bushel, and was assured by undoubted authority that on Peace river, 1,200 miles northwest of where I was, wheat was being produced in immense quantity equal to the best I saw in Winnipeg, while great herds of cattle were being fed without cost on as fine grassy land as the world affords. In short, between our northwestern line of 49 degrees and 54 degrees 40 minutes (Gen. Cass' fighting point), there is a country owned by England with greater grain and stock-growing capacity than all the lands on the Baltic, the Black Sea and the Mediterranean combined. The land laws of Canada are now as liberal as ours, as to the homestead pre-emption and free claims. People are crowding there rapidly, and towns are springing up as if by magic. Their great railway will reach the Pacific at the grand harbor of Puget sound before our Northern Pacific will, and it will be extended eastward promptly to Montreal. The distance to Liverpool will be 600 miles shorter than any American line can get the wheat of Dakota there. The best steel rails are being placed on the road, 100 tons to the mile, at $56 per ton, while on our parallel line of the Northern Pacific like rails (protected) cost about $70—$1,400 a mile in rails alone in favor of the Canadian Pacific.

American protectionists not only tell English statesmen, but denounce all of us who do not urge that policy, that it is their duty to protect Canadian products against American competition in England. I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that if England takes their advice, and, in order to have "fair trade" and protect home industries, shall impose a tariff tax of 10 or 20 cents per bushel upon American wheat and other grains, allowing Canadian wheat and other products to enter her ports free, she can bankrupt the farmers of our Northwest. She can, by a like discrimination as to beef, pork, butter, cheese and other farm products, cripple, if not ruin, our farmers all over the country, because it is too apparent to need argument that, with our vast railroad system and the agricultural lands developed by it, our own people cannot consume what our farmers produce. France and Germany are moving rapidly in the direction urged by American protectionists, and there is building up a party in England which is pressing warmly the same views as are held by American protectionists. The landed aristocracy of England is at the back of this party, and, in their greed, the advocates of this policy may yet succeed in overthrowing and destroying the agricultural interests and prosperity of their country.

No nation can find fault with even a high revenue tariff at our custom-houses. We have come out of a great civil war; we are burdened with an enormous debt which we are struggling to pay. That effort commends itself to all nations, and they do not seek to retaliate because of restrictions on their commerce imposed by us to obtain money to sustain our credit and develop our resources; but when they see a numerous and influential body of men maintaining a policy of actual protection and restriction merely to enrich a class at home, they may well pursue the same policy and justify it by the position maintained here.

Senator Beck's views on this subject are practically those held by Gov. Seymour.

GRANT ON PORTER.

His Change of Heart Causes Much Talk.

A Washington telegram says: The recent frank, unequivocal declaration of Gen. Grant to the effect that his opinion of the Fitz John Porter case has radically changed, and that he is now convinced Porter is a greatly injured man, is becoming more and more a subject of discussion among Congressmen, officials, and army people. Gen. Grant's statements are a great surprise to persons who have for many years bitterly denounced Porter and stubbornly defended the action of the court-martial. Gen. Grant's outspoken confession of his own error in this case, and his determination to make amends by doing all he can to remove the stigma from Porter's record, have brought embarrassment to men like Gen. Logan and Gen. Sherman, who during the last Congress claimed to have given a careful study to the evidence produced before the Schofield Board of Inquiry, and who, despite that evidence, stuck persistently to their old opinion.

The friends of Fitz John Porter were very much elated at the frank avowal of Gen. Grant that Porter has been wronged and ought to be vindicated. They expect to get a bill for Porter's reinstatement through this Congress now without much difficulty. A prominent Republican said to-night that Gen. Grant's change of opinion would not influence Senator Logan to reverse his judgment and favor the bill to reinstate Porter. He said Logan may, out of respect for Grant, remain silent, but he will not vote for such a bill. The Democrats generally give Gen. Grant credit for an honest change of opinion in this matter. A leading Democratic Senator said to-night that he took no stock in the theory that Grant was maneuvering to catch Democratic votes in favor of a bill for placing his own name on the army retired list. He said he knew Grant to be a very candid man, and one ready to make acknowledgment if he discovered himself to be in error; that, having recently studied the case for the first time, Grant reached the conclusion that his previous opinion had been wrong, and frankly said so. This Senator added that, in his opinion, the bill to retire Grant will pass, as several Democratic Senators—perhaps half a dozen—intend to vote for it. Any bill to simply reinstate Porter will receive the support of all the Democrats in Congress; but should it propose to reimburse him in the shape of back pay it will meet with strong opposition from some Democrats.

Porter Appeals to the President.

Gen. Fitz John Porter has sent to Senator Sewell, of New Jersey, an appeal to the President for a reopening and rehearing of his case. Porter asks that he be nominated to the Senate for restoration to his rank in the army. The appeal is indorsed by Gen. Grant, Gen. Terry and many other persons of note. Gen. Grant, in his letter of indorsement, states that he is now convinced that Porter rendered faithful, efficient and intelligent service, and asks the President to lay the whole matter before the Attorney General for his opinion.

DISASTROUS ACCIDENTS.

A Panic in a Peoria Church Causes the Death of Several People.

During the funeral of the Rev. Simon Kuhlehenhoelter, at Salem Evangelical Church, in Peoria, Ill., a frightful panic occurred. In the rush for the street some forty persons were injured, six, all ladies, seriously. The church is one of the largest in the city, and was filled with the friends of the deceased. All the seats were filled, and the standing-room in the aisles and about the doors was occupied. Soon after the services commenced the panic occurred. It is said that a seat in the gallery broke down. The people in the vicinity thought the gallery was giving away, and the rush commenced. Men, women and children poured out of the doors leading from the main floor and the gallery into the hall leading to the street. All efforts to stop them were fruitless. The people were frantic and would listen to nothing. In less than two minutes the doorway was blocked up, and the scene that followed was indescribable. The women who were caught in the crowd were thrown down and trampled upon. Their shrieks and the shouting of the men, who seemed to be frightened out of their senses, were fearful. For fully ten minutes the doorway was blocked up, and, during the greater portion of this time, half a dozen women lay on the steps under the feet of the frightened crowd. A few men who had lost their scare went to work heroically to rescue the women, and succeeded in getting them out after they had been walked over by a large number of men. As fast as taken out the victims were taken to adjoining houses and cared for. Forty persons were injured, four or more fatally, others being maimed for life.

An Artificial Earthquake.

In an open space about half a mile north of the public square in Oskaloosa, Iowa, stood the powder magazine of H. L. Spencer & Co. Three boys, one of them the son of the Mayor of Oskaloosa, went out to do a little target shooting with a magazine breech-loading rifle which the Mayor had drawn in a raffle, and had turned over to his son. The youngsters blazed away at the powder-magazine, using it as a target, and one of the explosives pierced the wall and ignited the powder inside the building. In the explosion of the five tons of powder the three boys were instantly killed, their bodies being horribly mangled. The bodies of the unfortunate boys were carried from fifty to 200 yards from the magazine, and mutilated almost beyond recognition. The explosion caused great damage to windows, nearly all the plate-glass fronts in the business quarter of the city being wrecked, while many houses in the north part of the city suffered severely, the damage aggregating not less than $20,000. Many persons were injured by falling glass and debris.

Bank Clearings in 1881.

The year just closed has been one of unexampled prosperity throughout the business and industrial circles of the country. This is reflected sharply in the clearings at the clearing-houses in the large cities, all but one showing an increase in the year's business over that of 1880. It is a striking evidence of the growth of our country that the total gross earnings of the large citities have increased in one twelvemonth from $50,668,934,098 to $64,409,580,967, or 27.1 per cent. Last year the increase over 1879 was 31.6 per cent. Tested by these records, the business of 1881 appears to have surpassed that of any previous year by between 1-5 and 1-6 in volume. The most remarkable increase of the year was that of Louisville, with 33 per cent. gain, followed by Kansas City, 32.9; Chicago, 30.5; Pittsburgh, 30.0; New York, 28.0; Boston, 27.2; Cincinnati, 43.7; San Francisco, 23; Indianapolis, 22.4; Cleveland, 21.8; Springfield, 17.9; St. Louis, 17; New Haven, 16.8; Worcester, 16.5; Philadelphia, 15.3; Lowell, 14.9; Milwaukee, 13.8, Syracuse, 10.5; Providence, 8.8; Baltimore, 7.4, New Orleans, 7.2; and Memphis, with a decrease of 6.1.

Two young Canadians who nearly killed themselves by blowing out the gas at a Bradford hotel, say they would do it again rather than turn the light down into the gas pipe and cause an explosion. The innocents are abroad and ought to be got home as speedily as possible.

INDIANA NEWS.

Indiana Educators in Council.

The annual meeting of the school teachers of the State was held at Indianapolis December 28-9. Gov. Porter delivered an address of welcome, which was responded to by the retiring President, Prof. John Cooper, of Evansville. Prof. Brown, of the State Normal School, presented a paper, his theme being, "School and Skill." The requisites for a skilled teacher were enumerated: 1. A mastery of the fundamental principles; 2, a knowledge of the child-mind; 3, a study of methods; 4, a study of models of art in teaching; 5, subjection to discipline of the school. He argued that the finest teaching is done in the region of the primary schools, and much of the poorest in the region of the higher grades. Prof. Mickleborough, of Cincinnati, insisted that there was a science in education, and that incompetent persons should not be licensed to teach. Prof. Walter R. Houghton, of the State University, read a paper on "The Union of Our Public School Systems." It was a triple system in his judgment—elementary, intermediate and university—and there was a lack of unity in the several departments. The first remedy is to require the country schools to be graded. A second is to grant diplomas to those finishing the elementary branches and passing them into the high schools, thus filling up the gap between the first and second departments. The second gap is filled by the third remedy, the granting of a high-school diploma admitting pupils to the colleges and universities. The speaker claimed that the success of Michigan University and other prominent universities mentioned is owing to the adoption of some such unity of action between the different departments of the educational system. This paper was regarded as important, and was generally discussed. President White, of Purdue University, took strong grounds against preparatory and college students being brought together under one discipline, and advocated the divorce of the two departments. Prof. J. J. Mills, of Indianapolis, submitted a paper on "Conscience Training in the Public Schools." There was a running debate on general topics, followed by an election of officers, resulting: President, H. S. Tarbell; Vice Presidents, W. S. Almont, J. M. Wallace, W. McBlake, Katharine Miller, R. S. Page, Sheridan Cox, W. H. Calkins; Recording Secretary, Annie E. H. Lemon; Executive Committee, R. G. Bome, Chairman; Secretary, J. F. Merrill.

The State Collegiate Association was in session at Indianapolis simultaneously with the State teachers. President Moore, of Earlham College, presided. After electing the following officers, the association adjourned for one year: President, Dr. Fisher, of Franklin College; Vice President, Dr. Holt, of Purdue University; Secretary, Prof. Coulter, of Wabash; Treasurer, Prof. Benton, of Butler University.

The high-school teachers of the State also met in separate convention and agreed upon the propriety of forming a State organization looking particularly to high-school work. Prof. Burdsall, of Richmond, was chosen President, and P. L. McCleary, of Vincennes, Secretary. The President was directed to appoint an executive committee, and the permanent organization was postponed until the next meeting of the State Teachers' Association.

A Fighting School-Teacher.

Near Morristown, this county, is a district school taught by Charles Gregory, a young man of unimpeachable integrity and marked ability. For some time he has been tormented almost past endurance by the conduct of one of his pupils, Add Anderson, an overgrown, double-fisted country boy, who conceived the idea that it was he and not the teacher who had charge of the school-room. Mr. Gregory bore the impudence and misconduct of the refractory man (for he is 19 years old) till patience ceased to be a virtue. Deeming it improper to bodily chastise such a person, the teacher very manfully put the case in the hands of the School Directors, where a thorough and impartial investigation was made. The facts sustaining the word of the teacher, the pupil was expelled. Anderson then appealed the case to the Township Trustee, but here he found no relief, as that official affirmed the decision of the Board of Directors.

Led on by the evil that is in him, young Anderson, accompanied by his father, went to the school house yesterday with the predetermined resolution to further harass Mr. Gregory. While old man Anderson would stand outside the hopeful son would enter the room, and, while there, would make all manner of noises, and would then boisterously bolt for the door, always heaping abuse with threats on the seemingly helpless pedagogue's head. This was done several times when Gregory concluded to defend his school. Accordingly, when Anderson entered again he was ordered out, but of course did not go, as this was what he wanted. Gregory then advanced to put him on the outside, and, as he did so, Anderson put his hand into his pocket, as if to draw a revolver, but, before he had time to draw a weapon, Gregory leveled his revolver on the ex-student and fired. The ball caught him in the shoulder, but inflicted only a slight wound, one that is not serious. The two were so close together when the shot was fired that Anderson's face was badly burned with powder. Finding that there is still a little grit left in the average Hoosier school teacher, Anderson beat a retreat, while Gregory went on with the daily exercises of the day. Late last night he came to this city, and put his case in the hands of Mr. E. K. Adams, but it is not probable that he will ever be arrested.

After Anderson left he returned, with the avowed determination to kill Gregory, but was foiled before he reached him by a young man who chanced by. Popular sentiment is with the teacher.

Indiana Horticultural Society.

The State Horticultural Society had an interesting meeting at Muncie. H. Furnas, of Danville, delivered an earnest speech in favor of planting catalpa speciosa in quantity as an investment paying more largely than money loaned at 6 per cent. The rapid growth would make the tree desirable, as in twenty years the tree would make the best of fence-posts and railroad ties. By planting four feet apart they would not need pruning, and the process of thinning out at four years would give the farm many needed sticks for repairs of fences, etc.

Granville Cowing, of Muncie, read an interesting paper on the "Production of Potatoes." Mr. Cowing is a successful grower, and has thoroughly tested all varieties introduced during twenty years.

Hon. J. C. Radcliff, President of the Purdue University, gave a report of the horticultural department of the school and its progress in educating the young as tillers of the soil. His report showed the school to be in a flourishing condition.

The election of officers resulted in the re-election of the following gentlemen: President, Sylvester Johnson, of Irvington; Secretary, W. H. Ragan, of Clayton; Treasurer, Daniel Cox, of Cartersburg. The following Vice Presidents were elected: First district, J. B. Elliott, of New Harmony; Second, Dennis Willey, of Charlestown; Third, C. M. Hobbs, of Bridgeport; Fourth, D. E. Hoffmann, of Winchester; Fifth, L. B. Custer, of Logansport; Sixth, I. D. G. Nelson, of Fort Wayne. The time of holding the annual meeting was changed to the first Tuesday in December, and Greencastle was selected as the place for the next meeting. The members visited the kindergarten school in a body, and witnessed the method used in instructing the young. A motion for a summer meeting was voted down. The State now gives the society $400, and an effort will be made at the next Legislature to have the sum increased to $1,000, to better enable the society to prosecute inquiries into the best methods of checking the rapidly-increasing insect pests. All members are urged to work for the increase of fruit display at fairs.

Colleges Becoming Mere Gymnasiums.

The President, Faculty, and Trustees of the College are becoming exercised in the matter of athletic sports and general recreation. Not before it is time. Body, mind, spirit, and pocket are all depleted by the excess to which these sports are carried. They are not pursued for exercise, but for championship, and this consumes time improperly and money unnecessarily, and defeats the very design for which gymnasiums and ball grounds were instituted. Students of to-day are in as much danger, perhaps more, of overtaxing themselves with muscle work than with brain work. Immunity from study by long vacations and so many hours devoted to athletics, as is now the practice in many of our colleges, is begetting the same following in men and boys all through the ranks of life, to the detriment of communities and the republic.—Princeton Letter in the Newark Advertiser.

Naval.

The following burlesque hits off most happily the class of inexperienced nobodies who have for so many years been at the head of our navy. But, aside from all such pleasantry, it is a stubborn fact that between these incompetent officials and an inefficient general government, our navy has been reduced to a mere shadow. The New York Graphic hits it as follows:

"And is this a ship?" asked the Secretary of the Marine at the navy yard. "I have heard of ships from my youth up, and have long desired to see one. Pray, do they float? Which end goes first? Why not have one stick instead of three sticking out of the deck? Why is not that stick upright like the rest?" asked the Secretary of the Navy of the Commandant of the navy yard, pointing to the bowsprit.

"That is the bowsprit," said the Commandant. "Bowsprits never stick up. They are meek and lowly in all their ways."

"What are these holes for?" asked the Secretary, pointing to the open hatchways. "Why have you made such deep excavations in the vessel?"

"The ship is built around these holes," said the Commandant, "but they extend no further. If they did the ship would sink."

"Were you ever in a storm at sea?" asked the Secretary of the Commandant.

"Only once," replied the Commandant. "It was a typhoon in longitude 81 off the Equator. We were blown clean out of the water twice, and spun for miles through the air like a balloon. I shall never forget the terrible appearance of the sea as we looked down upon it from the clouds. We got down safely to the water at last, and tied the ship to a water spout. It was a terrible time."

"Deary, deary me," said the Secretary; "how interesting. And you lived through it all. Tell us some more. But let me inquire first, is the capstan of a vessel equal in rank to the captain?"

"In ordinary times," said the Commandant, "the captain outranks the capstan. But the capstan always takes command of the ship when the anchor is weighed."

"Indeed," replied the Secretary. "But where is your fourth castle? I do not behold any castle on board at all."

"Fourth castle! Fourth castle! What do you mean, Secretary?" asked the amazed Commandant.

"Why, in all sea tales I've read of the fourth castle," said the Secretary.

"Oh, you mean the 'fokestle,'" said the Commandant.

"The what?" said the mystified Secretary.

"Fokestle, fokestle—place where the crew lives. Down there," said the Commandant.

"Why, it's a hole," said the Secretary. "Captain, I do not approve of your keeping your men in such dark, damp cellars. They will catch the rheumatix."

"And do the sailors really climb up there," asked the Secretary, looking aloft, "up those little rope ladders? How perilous."

"They do," responded the Commandant.

"I must improve on that," said the Secretary. "I will introduce a great reform in the service. I will save the life of many a gallant tar. Let all the masts be provided with hydraulic elevators."

"It shall be done," said the Commandant.

"Call the officer of the watch," suddenly demanded the Secretary; then remarking in an aside: "I'll show him that I know something about ships."

The officer appears.

"Officer," said the Secretary, "show us your watches; I want to see if they are all in good order."

"Sir, the watches were all sent on shore this morning to be cleaned," replied the officer of the watch.

"That's pretty work," growled the Secretary. "Why, where is the ship's jeweler? How do you suppose you would have the correct time if you were to keep an engagement with an enemy?"

"We should take the sun previously," remarked the officer of the watch.

"I do not wish you to take the Sun," thundered the Secretary. "I will not allow the Sun to be taken on this or any other United States vessel. You do not need the Sun. It is a villainous, vicious paper—bright, and edited with a certain amount of Satanic ability, I admit, but demoralizing to the correct disciple of the navy. If you desire to take anything, take the Evening Post or the Philadelphia Ledger. Take a good, heavy paper that will serve to ballast both the ship and your minds. Well, sir, if you have no watches on board, show us your clocks. You are officer of the clocks as well as the watches, are you not?"

"Aye, aye, sir," said the officer of the watch.

"I! I! What in the world makes you so egotistical in expressing yourself. Why don't you say yes, sir, like a white man?" said the Secretary.

"Yes, sir. But I am sorry to say that it was necessary to reef the pendulums of all our clocks during the last gale, and they have not been shaken out yet.'

"And what's all that banging for?" said the Secretary. "Is it a naval engagement?"

"We are firing the customary salute of nineteen guns in your honor," said the Commandant.

"Oh, you are, are you? Are there bullets in any of 'em? Are they pointed this way? I don't like it. It makes me nervous. I shall have that practice stopped. Commandant, after this fire anvils or toy pistols, and save powder. Dear me, if Chester would only let me stay, how cheap I could run our navy. I would abolish the ships altogether. We've got hardly any now, and so far as those are concerned that we have, we might as well have none at all. Good morning, Commandant."

The Place Where Cats Can't Live.

Jim Townsend, of Lundy, has been making some experiments with an ordinary domestic cat. It has been repeatedly stated that a cat could not live at an altitude of 13,000 feet above the sea. Mr. Townsend has demonstrated that such is the fact. On Monday last, he and another gentleman made the ascent of Castle Peak, which is a little over 13,000 feet high. They took with them a cat—Thomas—that was a year old, and had lived at an altitude of 6,000 feet with no symptoms of disease. Mr. Townsend had the cat in a box, and as they went up, he took observations and noted very carefully its every movement. When the summit was reached, they pitched their tent. This was about two o'clock in the afternoon. The cat partook of some food, and after playing for an hour or so, fell asleep, and did not wake up again until near midnight. When it did recover consciousness, it set up a howling, and appeared much distressed. Townsend pitied it and endeavored to make it feel at home, but of no use. It kept up its constant moaning and displayed symptoms of having fits. When morning came, the cat was offered food but refused to eat, and acted even more strangely than during the night. Townsend says it would open its mouth as if grasping for breath; would jump about, and then go to sleep and wake up with a start. All this while close watch was kept and every movement noted. At five o'clock in the afternoon the cat died of exhaustion.—[Bodie (Cal.) Free Press.

Holloway' Pills.

Never dispair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispells doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

The Origin of the Ivy.

BY CARLOTTA PERRY.

A wonderful plant it is I ween;
And just this very day it's been
My fortune to hear of the origin
Of this rare old plant. Its history
Is not put down in the botany;
But 'tis quite romantic, and, for aught that you
Or I can tell, it may be true.

Long, long ago, where the blue Rhine flows,
Close to its banks a castle rose.
There lived a noble of high degree;
A count at the very least was he.
Many a year 'gainst storm and flood
And many a siege had the castle stood,
Bravely and well; for on every side
Against assault it was fortified,
But one day something the walls did scale,
And 'gainst all cunning it did prevail;
Over and through, with the nicest art,
Till it reached the brave Count's manly heart.
It took the castle's strong defenses,
It almost took its owner's senses.
A little arrow and little bow,
A little archer, whose name you know,
Or will some day, were stronger far
Than all the engines of cruel war.
'Tis a fact beyond all contradiction
That truth is stranger far than fiction.
If this be fiction, then you can see
That strange, indeed, the truth would be.

The young Count loved. The maid was fair;
She had lovely masses of flaxen hair,
In many a plait. No doubt, upon it
He scribbled many a tender sonnet.
And eyes! oh, my! and lips! oh, me!
The very sweetest you ever "see,"
Cream and peaches, cherries, lillies,
Roses, stars—her beauty still is
Unexpressed; but, without doubt,
Your fancy'll fill the picture out.
He sang her praise in rhymes. The same
Were well-intentioned, but rather lame,
And every zephyr breathed her name;
At least, he thought so, and he could hear,
Or he thought he could, as sweet and clear
The blue Rhine singing, swept along,
Her praises borne on its silvery song.
He saw her eyes, or he thought he did,
In the blue of the violet shyly hid
In woodland ways. The saints forbid
That we sould doubt. It may be so;
For how are you and I to know?
And this I know, though I am not wise,
There's nothing so keen as a lover's eyes;
Unless it's his e urs. A genuine lover
Is much the same the wide world over;
And every record goes to prove
That this one was very much in love.
And he told her so; but it seemes that she
Had more than a spice of coquetry,
And when he fell on his bended knee,
She said: "You have really given me
A great surprise. I'd no 'idee'!
I'm sure, I'm sorry. I like you, yes;
As a friend, of course. Nay, do not press
The question. Wait just a little year;
Then come again. I will be here,
And I will answer." In sore distress,
He went away. I suppose, in fact,
He displayed a manly want of tact;
But he thought she meant just what she said.
It never entered his stupid head
That he could urge when she bid him not,

A year came 'round; again he came,
Still his heart owned the tender flame.
The same reply: "Two years from now
I will answer you." With a courtly bow,
Like one who deems't a compliment
In his lady's service to be spent,
Away from her side again he went—
Away to wars. Two cruel years
He passed in alternate hopes and fears.
Then he came and asked; but he did not plead.
I think he must have held the creed
That love, to be just what it ought,
Must be freely given, not begged nor bought;
And she, with sweet unreasoning,
Seemed to think it was no such thing.
So she said again: "Go now for five
Long years to war. Come back alive;
Thee will I answer." He turned as one
Who sees his last sweet hope go down;
And the lady, because he had obeyed
Her hard command, like any maid,
Went off up-stairs, where none were nigh,
And just indulged in a real good cry.
The years rolled on. From her castle-tower
(I forgot to state at an early hour
That she lived in a castle, too,) as fine
A one as there was on the river Rhine,
She watched with eyes that love made keen,
To see, of course, what could be seen.
At last, with triumph, back he came,
And Reica (that was the lady's name)
Saw him enter his palace gate;
Then, with a heart that was all elate,
She robed herself in royal state,
She plaited her wonderfully silken hair,
Inwaving many a jewel there;
In silken gown and laces rare
She made herself most sweet and fair.
But alas! and alas! the brave Count came
No more to her. 'Twixt love and shame
She struggled long; and then she wrote,
And sent to the castle a little note.
It was nicely written and very polite;
Neither warm nor cold, but exactly right.
"Would he please to call at eight that night?"
She waited an answer. It came at last.
She went to her room, locked it fast,
And opened the note, as girls have done
In every country beneath the sun,
In every age. There was but one
Small word therein; that word was "Wait!"
You can imagine her wretched state
At this turn of the tables. A year and then
The lady thought she would try again.
The love that she had so long defied,
And sought from her heart and his to hide,
Rose up and would not be denied.
Again this answer: "Wait! Wait!" Beside
This there was nothing. She felt her cup
With punishment was brimming up.
It hadn't been so hard for the Baron
(I mean the Count); but the long days wear on,
Slowly enough, as you understand,
To an aching heart and an idle hand.
He could go to war to relieve his lot;
And could work and fight, which she could not.
She couldn't sew, nor could she teach,
Nor practice medicine, neither preach.
She was not a lawyer, nor a cook;
She never thought of writing a book,
Nor children's stories. If she had, you see,
All would have ended differently
For her and the ivy, and you and me,
As you can perceive. I grieve to say
That under her sorrows she pined away.
At the two years' end she wrote: "[illegible],
Come to me quickly; for day by day
I pine. Ere another year goes by,
Unless you come, I shall surely die."
You'll not believe it; but sure as fate,
All that man answered to her was "Wait!"
Five times repeated. A year or two—
Maybe three—poor Reica lingered through,
And then she died; and they burried her
Where the dear, blue Rhine could sing to her;
As it swept along. From her grave there grew,
When the springtime came, a strange and new
Green creeping plant. No man had seen
Its like before. None knew its name.
From the very heart of the grave it came,
And over the grave it spread its green,
Then away from the heart of the grave it sent
Its tendrils out. And on it went,
Over the meadow, over the bridge,
Over the yellow willow-ridge—
Straight as though some subtle sense,
Some strangely human intelligence,
Guided its going, straight over all—
Till it reached the stern Count's castle-wall,
As on and on the strange plant crept,
Till it reached the castle, cold and grim,
The village maidens said, as they wept:
"Her woman heart climbs up to him;
He has not known of the tears she's shed;
He would not list to her love and woe;
She cannot sleep in her narrow bed,
Unless she makes him know."
Plainly by them was the sweet truth seen
(Love is master of every art),
That the strange and beautiful ivy green
Was the speech of a woman's heart.

Lads and lasses, unto you
Comes a gentle warning:
If or not this tale is true,
Heed, nor think of scorning
What is written. Who hath eyes,
He will read and not despise;
Who hath ears, my little screed
He or she will hear and heed.

Profanity.

[Bluffton Banner.]

We are emphatically in the age of profanity, and it seems that we are on the topmost current. One cannot go on the streets anywhere without having his ears offended with the vilest of words, and his reverence shocked by the most profane use of sacred names. Nor does it come alone, from old or middle age, but it is an alarming fact, that the younger portion of the community are most proficient in the use of degrading language. Boys and young men have an idea it is smart to swear; that it makes them manly, but there is no greater mistake in the world. Men, even those who swear themselves, are disgusted with profanity in boys; because they know, of all the bad habits, this clings the most closely and increases with years. It is the most insidious of habits, growing on so invisibly, that almost before one is aware he becomes an habitual curser. We speak of this, asking all those who have an influence over the young, and use profane language, to desist immediately, and set a good example for the rising young men in our midst.

Electricity Outdone.

[Mechanical Enquirer.]

The somewhat startling prophecy is hazarded that in future lumber will be of straw instead of wood. Experiments already instituted show that it is possible to make "wood" or its substitute from straw, of a tensil strength surpassing ordinary woods. This material is capable of being carried through all the manipulation that wood is, does not shrink, takes a high polish, and is water proof. In short, it not only answers all the purposes of wood, but is vastly better than it. There are two waste substances which have never been made profitable, these are coal slack or dust, and wood dust, commonly called sawdust. If any one can utilise these and turn them into lumber or fuel, it will be a substantial advantage.

Kidney Complaints

of all descriptions are relieved at once, and speedily cured by Kidney-Wort. It seems intended by nature for the cure of all diseases of the kidneys caused by weakness and debility. Its great tonic powers are especially directed to the removal of this class of diseases. We know of persons that have suffered for thirty years that have been permanently cured by taking Kidney-Wort a short time. Try it, either liquid or dry.—[Sun.

[Boston Post.]

A crowd waiting for a train at an up country railroad station had a heap of fun the other day. An old man came there with a small tin can, which he sat down on the platform. There was quite a crowd present, and among the gang a party with a big yellow dog, and a boy with his satanic majesty in his heart: The boy set out to have what he considered fun. While the farmer and the owner of the can were not looking, he inveigled the unsuspicious canine over by the can. Then he produced a cord and tied the can to the dog's tail. These proceedings were watched by many of the bystanders with keen interest. When the job was done the boy drew away to give the dog a chance to run. But the animal didn't. It just stood and looked miserable. The crowd whooped to start him. The commotion attracted the notice of the farmer and the owner of the can. The farmer was awful mad. He wanted to wallop whoever tied the thing to his dog, and was about to release him. But the old man interposed. "Run for your lives!" he cried; "there's dynamite in that can, and the minute the dog starts things will be scattered round here like an earthquake had called." A great change came o'er the crowd. Their looks of mirthful interest faded. They turned and fled. The dog saw them going and started after them. The farmer was nearly frantic. He wanted to save his dog, but, after hesitation, turned and fled, too. After him went the dog, on the gallop, dragging the can. It didn't explode at first, but they knew it was liable to at any minute, and they ran like deer. The train came to the station, and the old man, who had not fled, boarded it and left. Finally the can got detached from the dog's tail. Then the terror of the mob had subsided. They returned to the station. Somebody discovered that the cover of the can had come off. The can contained only two eggs. Half the crowd had intended to take the train, but by fleeing had lost it. They were the maddest men alive. They couldn't get at the old man for he had gone on the train. But they took hold of that boy, and while two held him the others took turns with the shingle. His yells were heard two miles away, and the hide on certain parts of him is all tired out. He won't try to amuse a crowd again.

Wearing the Beard.

The fashion of the apostles, now almost universally restored among men, says the Daily Advertiser, was regarded with deep detestation by one of the merchant princes of Boston, whose name for three generations has been held in high honor. He had once made an appointment with a young artist, being himself confined to his house by infirmity of increasing years. When the artist appeared, his handsome face decorated then, as now, by a full beard, the gentleman gazed upon him with amazement for a moment, and then, forgetting his business and his infirmity, and with exceeding warmth of manner, ordered the young man out of his presence.

In 1850 a young man, who had contracted with a highly respectable Pine street (New York) merchant for twelve months' service, was seized with a desire to let the hair grow on his upper lip. His employer treated it as a breach of contract, insisting that it would be a great damage to his trade for a clerk "to exhibit such a heathenish face."

This was the common feeling in banks, insurance companies, and like institutions. But it was especially fervent and intolerant in the church. One of the members of Rev. Dr. Bethune's church, in Brooklyn, having met with an accident which interrupted his usual habit of shaving for two or three weeks, found so little discomfort from the growth of that time that he decided to give it further trial. When he appeared at church there was commotion among the good people, men and women. Several of them waited upon the doctor, after the service, to enlist him against this daring innovation. To their astonishment he had already gone over to the enemy, and quoted scripture and the church fathers in support of the heresy. "But imagine," said one old lady, "a Chalmers or a Newton with such an unsightly growth!" The doctor gently answered, "When you come to example, my dear woman, imagine St. Paul or our Savior without it, if you can!"

—I had severe attacks of gravel and kidney trouble; was unable to get any medicine or doctor to cure me until I used Hop Bitters, and they cured me in a short time.—[A Distinguished Lawyer of Wayne Co., N. Y. 3-2w.

The Needle's Eye.

The passage from the new testament. "It is easier for a camel," etc., has perplexed many good men who have read it literally. In Oriental cities there are in the large gates, small and very low apertures, called metaphorically "needles' eye," just as we talk of windows on shipboard as "bull's eyes." These entrances are too narrow for a camel to pass through them in the ordinary manner, or even if loaded. When a loaded camel has to pass through one of these entrances, it kneels down, its load is removed, and then it shuffles through on its knees. "Yesterday," writes Lady Duff Gordon from Cairo, "I saw a camel go through the eye of a needle, that is, the low, arched door of an enclosure. He must kneel and bow his head to creep through; and thus the rich man must humble himself."

Size Him Up as a Flat.

As Police Justice Wandell was walking on Broadway, near Tenth street, on Friday afternoon, a well-dressed man seized his hand and shook it heartily, "Why, you can't tell how delighted I am to see you," he said. "How is Mrs. ——a—Mrs.——. Do you know I have almost forgotton your name?" "My name is Wandell," said the justice, "and I am a police magistrate in this city." As the man's coat-tails disappeared around the corner the justice met a friend. "Do I look very green?" he inquired. "No," said the friend, "why do you ask?" "Nothing, only to-day, for the third time, a confidence man has tried to trap me."—[New York Sun.

Naval.

The following burlesque hits off most happily the class of inexperienced nobodies who have for so many years been at the head of our navy. But, aside from all such pleasantry, it is a stubborn fact, that between these incompetent officials and an inefficient general government, our navy has been reduced to a mere shadow. The New York Graphic hits it as follows:

"And is this a ship?" asked the Secretary of the Marine at the navy yard. "I have heard of ships from my youth up, and have long desired to see one. Pray, do they float? Which end goes first? Why not have one stick instead of three sticking out of the deck? Why is not that stick upright like the rest?" asked the Secretary of the Navy of the Commandant of the navy yard, pointing to the bowsprit.

"That is the bowsprit," said the Commandant. "Bowsprits never stick up. They are meek and lowly in all their ways."

"What are these holes for?" asked the Secretary, pointing to the open hatchways. "Why have you made such deep excavations in the vessel?"

"The ship is built around these holes," said the Commandant, "but they extend no further. If they did the ship would sink."

"Were you ever in a storm at sea?" asked the Secretary of the Commandant.

"Only once," replied the Commandant. "It was a typhoon in longitude 81 off the Equator. We were blown clean out of the water twice, and spun for miles through the air like a balloon. I shall never forget the terrible appearance of the sea as we looked down upon it from the clouds. We got down safely to the water at last, and tied the ship to a water spout. It was a terrible time."

"Deary, deary me," said the Secretary; "how interesting. And you lived through it all. Tell us some more. But let me inquire first, is the capstan of a vessel equal in rank to the captain?"

"In ordinary times," said the Commandant, "the captain outranks the capstan. But the capstan always takes command of the ship when the anchor is weighed."

"Indeed," replied the Secretary. "But where is your fourth castle? I do not behold any castle on board at all."

"Fourth castle! Fourth castle! What do you mean, Secretary?" asked the amazed Commandant.

"Why, in all sea tales I've read of the fourth castle," said the Secretary.

"Oh, you mean the 'fokestle,'" said the Commandant.

"The what?" said the mystified Secretary.

"Fokestle, fokestle—place where the crew lives. Down there," said the Commandant.

"Why, it's a hole," said the Secretary. "Captain, I do not approve of your keeping your men in such dark, damp cellars. They will catch the rheumatix."

"And do the sailors really climb up there," asked the Secretary, looking aloft, "up those little rope ladders? How perilous."

"They do," responded the Commandant.

"I must improve on that," said the Secretary. "I will introduce a great reform in the service. I will save the life of many a gallant tar. Let all the masts be provided with hydraulic elevators."

"It shall be done," said the Commandant,

"Call the officer of the watch," suddenly demanded the Secretary; then remarking in an aside: "I'll show him that I know something about ships."

The officer appears.

"Officer," said the Secretary, "show us your watches; I want to see if they are all in good order."

"Sir, the watches were all sent on shore this morning to be cleaned," replied the officer of the watch.

"That's pretty work," growled the Secretary. "Why, where is the ship's jeweler? How do you suppose you would have the correct time if you were to keep an engagement with an enemy?"

"We should take the sun previously," remarked the officer of the watch.

"I do not wish you to take the Sun," thundered the Secretary. "I will not allow the Sun to be taken on this or any other United States vessel. You do not need the Sun. It is a villainous, vicious paper—bright, and edited with a certain amount of Satanic ability, I admit, but demoralizing to the correct disciple of the navy. If you desire to take anything, take the Evening Post or the Philadelphia Ledger. Take a good, heavy paper that will serve to ballast both the ship and your minds. Well, sir, if you have no watches on board, show us your clocks. You are officer of the clocks as well as the watches, are you not?"

"Aye, aye, sir," said the officer of the watch.

"I! I! What in the world makes you so egotistical in expressing yourself. Why don't you say yes, sir, like a white man?" said the Secretary.

"Yes, sir. But I am sorry to say that it was necessary to reef the pendulums of all our clocks during the last gale, and they have not been shaken out yet."

"And what's all that banging for?" said the Secretary. "Is it a naval engagement?"

"We are firing the customary salute of nineteen guns in your honor," said the Commandant.

"Oh, you are, are you? Are there bullets in any of 'em? Are they pointed this way? I don't like it. It makes me nervous. I shall have that practice stopped. Commandant, after this fire anvils or toy pistols, and save powder. Dear me, if Chester would only let me stay, how cheap I could run our navy. I would abolish the ships altogether. We've got hardly any now, and so far as those are concerned that we have, we might as well have none at all. Good morning, Commandant."

The Place Where Cats Can't Live.

Jim Townsend, of Lundy, has been making some experiments with an ordinary domestic cat. It has been repeatedly stated that a cat could not live at an altitude of 13,000 feet above the sea. Mr. Townsend has demonstrated that such is the fact. On Monday last, he and another gentleman made the ascent of Castle Peak, which is a little over 13,000 feet high. They took with them a cat—Thomas—that was a year old, and had lived at an altitude of 6,000 feet with no symptoms of disease. Mr. Townsend had the cat in a box, and as they went up, he took observations and noted very carefully its every movement. When the summit was reached, they pitched their tent. This was about two o'clock in the afternoon. The cat partook of some food, and after playing for an hour or so, fell asleep, and did not wake up again until near midnight. When it did recover consciousness, it set up a howling, and appeared much distressed. Townsend pitied it and endeavored to make it feel at home, but of no use. It kept up its constant moaning and displayed symptoms of having fits. When morning came, the cat was offered food but refused to eat, and acted even more strangely than during the night. Townsend says it would open its mouth as if grasping for breath; would jump about, and then go to sleep and wake up with a start. All this while close watch was kept and every movement noted. At five o'clock in the afternoon the cat died of exhaustion.—[Bodie (Cal.) Free Press.

Never dispair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. The Origin of the Ivy.

BY CARLOTTA PERRY.

A wonderful plant it is I ween;
And just this very day it's been
My fortune to hear of the origin
Of this rare old plant. Its history
Is not put down in the botany;
But 'tis quite romantic, and, for aught that you
Or I can tell, it may be true.

Long, long ago, where the blue Rhine flows,
Close to its banks a castle rose.
There lived a noble of high degree;
A count at the very least was he,
Many a year 'gainst storm and flood
And many a siege had the castle stood,
Bravely and well; for on every side
Against assault it was fortified.
But one day something the walls did scale,
And 'gainst all cunning it did prevail;
Over and through, with the nicest art,
Till it reached the brave Count's manly heart.
It took the castle's strong defenses,
It almost took its owner's senses.
A little arrow and little bow,
A little archer, whose name you know,
Or will some day, were stronger far
Than all the engines of cruel war.
'Tis a fact beyond all contradiction
That truth is stranger far than fiction.
If this be fiction, then you can see
That strange, indeed, the truth would be.

The young Count loved. The maid was fair;
She had lovely masses of flaxen hair,
In many a plait. No doubt, upon it
He scribbled many a tender sonnet,
And eyes! oh, my! and lips! oh, me!
The very sweetest you ever "see."
Cream and peaches, cherries, lilies,
Roses, stars—her beauty still is
Unexpressed; but, without doubt,
Your fancy'll fill the picture out.
He sang her praise in rhymes. The same
Were well-intentioned, but rather lame,
And every zephyr breathed her name;
At least, he thought so, and he could hear,
Or he thought he could, as sweet and clear
The blue Rhine singing, swept along,
Her praises borne on its silvery song.
He saw her eyes, or he thouget he did,
In woodland ways. The saints forbid
That we sould doubt. It may be so;
For how are you and I to know?
And this I know, though I am not wise,
There's nothing so keen as a lover's eyes;
Unless it's his ears. A genuine lover
Is much the same the wide world over;
And every record goes to prove
That this one was very much in love.
And he told her so; but it seemes that she
Had more than a spice of coquetry,
And when he fell on his bended knee,
She said: "You have really given me
A great surprise. I'd no 'idee'!
I'm sure, I'm sorry. I like you, yes;
As a friend, of course. Nay, do not press
The question. Wait just a little year;
Then come again. I will be here,
And I will answer." In sore distress,
He went away. I suppose, in fact,
He displayed a manly want of tact;
But he thought she meant just what she said.
It never entered his stupid head
That he could urge when she bid him not,

A year came 'round; again he came.
Still his heart owned the tender flame.
The same reply: "Two years from now
I will answer you." With a courtly bow,
Like one who deems't a compliment
In his lady's service to be spent,
Away from her side again he went—
Away to wars. Two cruel years
He passed in alternate hopes and fears.
Then he came and asked; but he did not plead.
I think he must have held the creed
That love, to be just what it ought,
Must be freely given, not begged nor bought;
And she, with sweet unreasoning,
Seemed to think it was no such thing.
So she said again: "Go now for five
Long years to war. Come back alive;
Thee will I answer." He turned as one
Who sees his last sweet hope go down;
And the lady, because he had obeyed
Her hard command, like any maid,
Went off up-stairs, where none were nigh,
(I forgot to state at an early hour
That she lived in a castle, too,) as fine
A one as there was on the river Rhine,
She watched with eyes that love made keen,
To see, of course, what could be seen.
At last, with triumph, back he came,
And Reica (that was the lady's name)
Saw him enter his palace gate;
Then, with a heart that was all elate,
She robed herself in royal state,
She plaited her wonderfully silken hair,
Inwaving many a jewel there;
In silken gown and laces rare
She made herself most sweet and fair.
But alas! and alas! the brave Count came
No more to her. 'Twixt love and shame
She struggled long; and then she wrote,
And sent to the castle a little note.
It was nicely written and very polite;
Neither warm nor cold, but exactly right.
"Would he please to call at eight that night?"
She waited an answer. It came at last.
She went to her room, locked it fast,
And opened the note, as girls have done
In every country beneath the sun,
In every age. There was but one
Small word therein; that word was "Wait!"
You can imagine her wretched state
At this turn of the tables. A year and then
The lady thought she would try again.
The love that she had so long defied,
And sought from her heart and his to hide,
Rose up and would not be denied.
Again this answer: "Wait! Wait!" Beside
This there was nothing. She felt her cup
With punishment was brimming up.
It hadn't been so hard for the Baron
(I mean the Count); but the long days wear on
Slowly enough, as you understand,
To an aching heart and an idle hand.
He could go to war to relieve his lot;
And could work and fight, which she could not.
She couldn't sew, nor could she teach,
Nor practice medicine, neither preach.
She was not a lawyer, nor a cook;
She never thought of writing a book,
Nor children's stories. If she had, you see,
All would have ended differently
For her and the ivy, and you and me,
As you can perceive. I grieve to say
That under her sorrows she pined away.
At the two years' end she wrote: "I pray,
Come to me quickly; for day by day
I pine. Ere another year goes by,
Unless you come, I shall surely die."
You'll not believe it; but sure as fate,
All that man answered to her was "Wait!"
Five times repeated. A year or two—
Maybe three—poor Reica lingered through,
And then she died; and they burried her
Where the dear, blue Rhine could sing to her,
As it swept along. From her grave there grew,
When the springtime came, a strange and new
Green creeping plant. No man had seen
Its like before. None knew its name.
From the very heart of the grave it came,
And over the grave it spread its green,
Then away from the heart of the grave it sent
Its tendrils out. And on it went,
Over the meadow, over the bridge,
Over the yellow willow-ridge—
Straight as though some subtle sense,
Some strangely human intelligence,
Guided its going, straight over all—
Till it reached the stern Count's castle-wall,
As on and on the strange plant crept,
Till it reached the castle, cold and grim,
The village maidens said, as they wept:
"Her woman heart climbs up to him;
He has not known of the tears she's shed;
He would not list to her love and woe;
She cannot sleep in her narrow bed,
Unless she makes him know."
Plainly by them was the sweet truth seen
(Love is master of every art),
That the strange and beautiful ivy green
Was the speech of a woman's heart.

Lads and lasses, unto you
Comes a gentle warning:
If or not this tale is true,
Heed, nor think of scorning
What is written. Who hath eyes,
He will read and not despise;
Who hath ears, my little screed
He or she will hear and heed.

Profanity.

[Bluffton Banner.]

We are emphatically in the age of profanity, and it seems that we are on the topmost current. One cannot go on the streets anywhere without having his ears offended with the vilest of words, and his reverence shocked by the most profane use of sacred names. Nor does it come alone, from old or middle age, but it is an alarming fact, that the younger portion of the community are most proficient in the use of degrading language. Boys and young men have an idea it is smart to swear; that it makes them manly, but there is no greater mistake in the world. Men, even those who swear themselves, are disgusted with profanity in boys; because they know, of all the bad habits, this clings the most closely and increases with years. It is the most insidious of habits, growing on so invisibly, that almost before one is aware he becomes an habitual curser. We speak of this, asking all those who have an influence over the young, and use profane language, to desist immediately, and set a good example for the rising young men in our midst.

Electricity Outdone.

[Mechanical Enquirer.]

The somewhat startling prophecy is hazarded that in future lumber will be of straw instead of wood. Experiments already instituted show that it is possible to make "wood" or its substitute from straw, of a tensil strength surpassing ordinary woods. This material is capable of being carried through all the manipulation that wood is, does not shrink, takes a high polish, and is water proof. In short, it not only answers all the purposes of wood, but is vastly better than it. There are two waste substances which have never been made profitable, these are coal slack or dust, and wood dust, commonly called sawdust. If any one can utilize these and turn them into lumber or fuel, it will be a substantial advantage.

Kidney Complaints

of all descriptions are relieved at once, and speedily cured by Kidney-Wort. It seems intended by nature for the cure of all diseases of the kidneys caused by weakness and debility. Its great tonic powers are especially directed to the removal of this class of diseases. We know of persons that have suffered for thirty years that have been permanently cured by taking Kidney-Wort a short time. Try it, either liquid or dry.—[Sun.

Scared by Dynamite.

[Boston Post.]

A crowd waiting for a train at an up country railroad station had a heap of fun the other day. An old man came there with a small tin can, which he sat down on the platform. There was quite a crowd present, and among the gang a party with a big yellow dog, and a boy with his satanic majesty in his heart: The boy set out to have what he considered fun. While the farmer and the owner of the can were not looking, he inveigled the unsuspicious canine over by the can. Then he produced a cord and tied the can to the dog's tail. These proceedings were watched by many of the bystanders with keen interest. When the job was done the boy drew away to give the dog a chance to run. But the animal didn't. It just stood and looked miserable. The crowd whooped to start him. The commotion attracted the notice of the farmer and the owner of the can. The farmer was awful mad. He wanted to wallop whoever tied the thing to his dog, and was about to release him. But the old man interposed. "Run for your lives!" he cried; "there's dynamite in that can, and the minute the dog starts things will be scattered round here like an earthquake had called." A great change came o'er the crowd. Their looks of mirthful interest faded. They turned and fled. The dog saw them going and started after them. The farmer was nearly frantic. He wanted to save his dog, but, after hesitation, turned and fled, too. After him went the dog, on the gallop, dragging the can. It didn't explode at first, but they knew it was liable to at any minute, and they ran like deer. The train came to the station, and the old man, who had not fled, boarded it and left. Finally the can got detached from the dog's tail. Then the terror of the mob had subsided. They returned to the station. Somebody discovered that the cover of the can had come off. The can contained only two eggs. Half the crowd had intended to take the train, but by fleeing had lost it. They were the maddest men alive. They couldn't get at the old man for he had gone on the train. But they took hold of that boy, and while two held him the others took turns with the shingle. His yells were heard two miles away, and the hide on certain parts of him is all tired out. He won't try to amuse a crowd again.

Wearing the Beard.

The fashion of the apostles, now almost universally restored among men, says the Daily Advertiser, was regarded with deep detestation by one of the merchant princes of Boston, whose name for three generations has been held in high honor. He had once made an appointment with a young artist, being himself confined to his house by infirmity of increasing years. When the artist appeared, his handsome face decorated then, as now, by a full beard, the gentleman gazed upon him with amazement for a moment, and then, forgetting his business and his infirmity, and with exceeding warmth of manner, ordered the young man out of his presence.

In 1850 a young man, who had contracted with a highly respectable Pine street (New York) merchant for twelve months' service, was seized with a desire to let the hair grow on his upper lip. His employer treated it as a breach of contract, insisting that it would be a great damage to his trade for a clerk "to exhibit such a heathenish face."

This was the common feeling in banks, insurance companies, and like institutions. But it was especially fervent and intolerant in the church. One of the members of Rev. Dr. Bethune's church, in Brooklyn, having met with an accident which interrupted his usual habit of shaving for two or three weeks, found so little discomfort from the growth of that time that he decided to give it further trial. When he appeared at church there was commotion among the good people, men and women. Several of them waited upon the doctor, after the service, to enlist him against this daring innovation. To their astonishment he had already gone over to the enemy, and quoted scripture and the church fathers in support of the heresy. "But imagine," said one old lady, "a Chalmers or a Newton with such an unsightly growth!" The doctor gently answered, "When you come to example, my dear woman, imagine St. Paul or our Savior without it, if you can!"

—I had severe attacks of gravel and kidney trouble; was unable to get any medicine or doctor to cure me until I used Hop Bitters, and they cured me in a short time.—[A Distinguished Lawyer of Wayne Co., N. Y. 3-2w.

The Needle's Eye.

The passage from the new testament. "It is easier for a camel," etc., has perplexed many good men who have read it literally. In Oriental cities there are in the large gates, small and very low apertures, called metaphorically "needles' eye," just as we talk of windows on shipboard as "bull's eyes." These entrances are too narrow for a camel to pass through them in the ordinary manner, or even if loaded. When a loaded camel has to pass through one of these entrances, it kneels down, its load is removed, and then it shuffles through on its knees. "Yesterday," writes Lady Duff Gordon from Cairo, "I saw a camel go through the eye of a needle, that is, the low, arched door of an enclosure. He must kneel and bow his head to creep through; and thus the rich man must humble himself."

As Police Justice Wandell was walking on Broadway, near Tenth street, on Friday afternoon, a well-dressed man seized his hand and shook it heartily. "Why, you can't tell how delighted I am to see you," he said. "How is Mrs. ——a—Mrs.——. Do you know I have almost forgotton your name?" "My name is Wandell," said the justice, "and I am a police magistrate in this city." As the man's coat-tails disappeared around the corner the justice met a friend. "Do I look very green?" he inquired. "No," said the friend, "why do you ask?" "Nothing, only to-day, for the third time, a confidence man has tried to trap me."—[New York Sun.

WHAT TIME IS IT?

What time is it?
Time to do well—
Time to live better—
Give up that grudge—
Answer that letter—
Speak that kind word, to sweeten a sorrow;
Do that good deed you would leave till to-morrow.
Time to try hard
In that new situation—
Time to build up on
A solid foundation,
Giving up needlessly, changing and drifting;
Leaving the quicksands that ever are shifting.

What time is it?
Time to be thrifty;
Farmers take warning—
Plow in the springtime—
Sow in the morning—
Spring rain is coming, zephyrs are blowing;
Heaven will attend to the quickening and growing.
Time to count cost—
Lessen expense—
Time to look well
To the gates and the fences,
Making and mending, as good workers should;
Shutting out evil and keeping the good.

What time is it?
Time to be earnest,
Laying up treasure,
Time to be thoughtful,
Choosing true pleasure;
Loving stern justice—of truth being fond;
Making your word just as good as your bond.
Time to be happy,
Doing your best—
Time to be truthful,
Leaving the rest,
Knowing in whatever country or clime
Ne'er can we call back one minute of time.

THE COUNTRY POSTMAN.

The Story of a Hero.

[Translated from the French of Louis Collas.]

You have often seen him pass through the fields with a hasty tread, recognizable not only by his blouse and his regulation hat, but also by the sustained activity of his movements, because for him the instants are counted and he has not the right to slacken his pace. An indefatigable walker, he accomplishes his task from the first to the last day of the year without even resting. No matter though a tropical sun invite all creatures to become motionless, though the cold be Siberian, though it blow and snow, he must go to the last village on his route to carry the letters, newspapers and prospectuses which trade confides by millions to the case of the post.

The highways are not made for him, and he must cross the country, passing through woods and marshes, to seek the hut lost in the depths of solitude, far removed from any public road.

He travels from eight to ten leagues daily, making circuits, crossing brooks, scaling rocks, venturing into ravines and wounding himself among the hedges and briars. Loitering is forbidden to him, for the official hour of return is fixed; the letters he brings back must depart by the next mail. They are waited for at the postoffice, and the least variation of his programme may have grave consequences.

We cannot, without ingratitude, forget the services of this incorruptible messenger, whose probity and zeal are constantly put to proof, who brings us at a certain hour our letters and our journals, the news, the expectation of which keeps us full of anxiety; who contribute to soften for us the bitterness of absence and distance. Imagine the void the disappearance of these humble functionaries would leave in our existence!

I knew a man who for twenty years filled this position. A former soldier, thanks to irreproachable records of service strengthened by a little influence, he had obtained the great favor of having placed to his credit fifty francs per month at the postoffice of the district.

Pere Martin was not very fond of this brilliant position, but he perfectly understood his responsibility and duties; he never complained.

Everybody in the district was acquainted with this little gray-haired man with bronzed features, whose limbs had the pliancy and strength of steel. He was highly appreciated, for, while a scrupulous observer of the regulations, he never refused to perform a service, provided it did not conflict with his duties.

There was not a corner of his route which he had not passed over accompanied by his wolf-dog. He knew to a meter the distance separating the smallest hamlet from the chief town of the district, and was familiar with all the paths and by-ways.

To spare himself half an hour's walk he never would have thrown into a ditch some silly prospectus or some printed matter bearing a doubtful address; if he returned anything to the postoffice it was because its destination could not be found. He was the slave of his orders, as punctual as the clock, and so discreet as to discourage the most curious. Everybody greeted him kindly when he arrived at a village; the children came to him, and even the dogs barked joyously at his approach. There was considerable rivalry as to who should offer him a glass of cider and a slice of bacon. But he rarely accepted anything. Time passed and he did not like to contract troublesome obligations.

Hence the notes made concerning him were excellent, and his chief regretted that the parsimony of the administration only permitted them to reward his loyal services with contemptible gifts.

One day in the middle of October he departed on his usual round. The weather was frightful; it had been raining incessantly for more than a week; the roads had become bogs, and the brooks had been transformed into torrents. What foliage remained on the trees was so impregnated with water that it could not offer a protecting shelter. The postman, wet to the skin, walked with the impassibility of an old soldier who does not discuss his orders.

He had distributed a portion of his mail, but his round was far from being finished, when he passed an inn, or rather a miserable drinking house, situated at the entrance of a wood. This place was mainly patronized by sabot makers, who found there alcoholic drinks and a few groceries.

"Ho! Monsieur, the postman, stop here for an instant; while you are giving me the information I need, the violence of the storm will abate."

This invitation was addressed to him by a man who, with a pipe in his mouth, was standing upon the threshold of the drinking house.

The rain was pouring down at that moment; a fierce blast swept it into Pere Martin's face, prevented him from walking and bent to the ground the stalwart trees.

The postman was a little ahead of time, and the demands of the service do not go so far as to forbid the acceptance of a momentary shelter when it offers itself under such circumstances.

He, therefore, went into the house and sat down beside the fire which crackled on the hearth. The man who had invited him to enter threw upon it some branches, which were soon in flames; a heavy vapor arose from Martin's soaked garments.

The stranger interrogated the postman as to the hours of the departure of the mails, and asked him a host of questions about himself, his service and everything concerning it.

"You know me, then?" said the postman.

"Parbleu! Everybody loves and esteems you here; Pere Martin's value is well known. I hope you will not refuse to drink with me. Ho! Madame Rosier, two glasses of your best brandy."

A woman waited on them and returned to her occupation.

"What a dog's trade you follow, Pere Martin!" said the man. "Will it take you much longer to finish your round? You doubtless have yet to go to the Landa Grise, to Plessis. I know some one who is impatiently waiting for you there. I am obliged to pass in the vicinity. If you wish it I will relieve you of your letters."

"Thank you; I will deliver them myself."

"That's yourself out and out. After all, you are right. It is your duty to deliver them."

While talking with eloquacity which did not encourage the postman, he took up the sack the latter had placed beside him, seemed to feel its weight, and turned it over and over.

"Let my sack alone, please," said Martin, coldly. "You have disarranged all my letters. I shall no longer know what to do.

The other humbly excused himself for this awkwardness.

"The evil is reparable," added he. "Seat yourself at this table and you will have no trouble to arrange the letters according to the route you should take."

The postman emptied his sack before him and began to arrange his letters. His questioner affected to keep discreetly at a distance, but found an opportunity to cast a furtive glance over his shoulder.

"Pere Martin, help me to prevent your dog from strangling mine," said his new acquaintance.

This fact seemed strange to Martin. He felt distrust of the communicative stranger grow upon him. He was about to replace his papers in the sack, when the man, as if to see what was the state of the weather, opened the door.

At the same instant the wind swept impetuously into the room, which it filled with a thick smoke, and, lifting the letters spread out upon the table, scattered them in every direction.

The postman uttered an exclamation of anger.

"Bah! it is nothing," said the person who had caused the accident. "We two will speedily gather them up."

And without heeding the refusal of Martin, who wished to avoid his help and do the work alone, he began to search for the letters.

When they had collected all they could find, the postman carefully examined them; then he seemed worried, as if he had not the full number.

"Are there any missing?" asked his companion.

"It appears to me that there was another letter."

"That is quite possible."

He said to himself that it must be so. However, he resumed his hunt and searched beneath the furniture. He found nothing, and concluded that his memory had not served him faithfully, for he had watched his companion's movements, and it did not seem admissible to him that he had stolen a letter. Nevertheless he hastened to depart, regretting that he had entered the drinking house. The man who had chatted with him inspired in him a veritable repulsion, and it was his rule, because of the habits of discretion which the postoffice imposes upon all its agents, to keep at a distance all who did not appear to him worthy of confidence.

The storm had somewhat abated its fury, the rain soon ceased to fall, and bright sunshine lighted up the country when the postman reached the nearest village.

A woman was at the door of her house awaiting his passage. She was still young, and, without possessing remarkable beauty, had a neat and sympathetic countenance.

"Monsieur Martin," said she to the postman, "have you a letter for me?"

"No, Madame Andre, I have not."

"That's strange; my husband should have written to me to-day; you cannot imagine how much his silence troubles me."

She grew pale and seemed scarcely to have the strength to sustain herself.

The postman assisted her into the house and handed her a chair, upon which she let herself fall. Two charming children fixed on her sad and anxious looks.

"You will receive a letter to-morrow, Madame Andre," said Pere Martin; "the delay of a day is easily explained; your husband was disappointed, some unforeseen business suddenly demanded his attention and he missed the mail."

"No; I know him and cannot understand his silence. You are aware that he departed two months ago for the city. Some work was to be attended to which promised to bring him in a great deal of money; a small inheritance was also to be received. But all is concluded. He sent me word that he would return this evening; he has made his arrangements to that end. To-morrow the farm of La Mane is to be sold; he has decided to purchase either all or part of it. It is an opportunity which will never again present itself, but I would prefer a thousand times that he should miss it to have him returning without notifying me."

"Why?"

"Because some one has wicked designs against him, and at night a terrible blow is soon struck. You know that there are two routes by which to return he e; one is longer than the other, but safer. I am afraid lest he may return by way of the Moulin-Brule, the more so as there is some one to see that direction. I tremble at the mere thought of it. If I only knew—"

The postman strove to calm her fears, but she shook her head.

"You can't think," resumed she, "what certain men are capable of, when they have a grudge against anybody."

She seemed to hesitate, and then added:

"If I tremble it is not simply because my husband will have to pass through a dangerous spot with money in his pocket, but also because there is in the district a wretch whose dearest wish is to put five feet of earth between them.

"This hatred dates from long ago. When I was a young girl he wanted to marry me, but he filled me with horror. He has never pardoned me for having repulsed his offers, and has enveloped in the same animosity the man I preferred to him. He hates George and myself for being in easy circumstances, while he vegetates in want, as if honest people were responsible for the mistakes of idlers and drunkards. This is not all. A crime was recently committed; suspicions were aroused, but proofs were wanting. I possess them and the guilty man knows it. Ah! it is a dangerous secret for a woman who has only children around her!

"Yesterday he accosted me to sound me; I did not hide from him my contempt. He saw clearly that he was unmasked in my eyes; he overwhelmed me with insults and threats. I took the unfortunate notion to say to him that soon, when my husband returned, when he had a man before him, he would be less presumptuous. Oh! if you knew what glances his eyes shot at me, what an expression of hatred his features wore! I know that often during the night he haunts the ruins of Moulin-Brule. If this man should discover that my husband is to pass through that place, I tell you, Monsieur Martin, he is lost."

"What is the scoundrel's name?"

"Jean Bruno. It is not astonishing that you are unacquainted with him, for since his return to the district he has not publicly shown himself."

The postman was silent. He remembered having heard the woman at the drinking house call the man he had met there by that name. He asked himself in consternation if the letter had not been stolen from him, but he recalled all the circumstances and banished this supposition. He felt certain that the epistle had not been in his sack; he reassured himself and sought to reassure the woman; yet he resolved to wait her husband's arrival at the chief town of the district to advise him to be prudent.

He hastened away, and when he was alone his fears regained possession of him. He again began to doubt, and little by little was seized upon by a terror he could not explain. He increased his pace and leaped over the hedges and ditches with unusual nimbleness. Unfortunately, his round that day was exceptionally long, and the bad weather in advance had considerably delayed him.

He reached the postoffice a little later than was his custom. The woman who distributed the mails, on being consulted by him, affirmed that he had taken away a letter for Mme. Andre. One of her assistants confirmed this declaration.

The postman was thunderstruck. He saw with fright the heavy responsibility thrown upon him. His terror augmented when he remembered that time and again, at the moment of opening the mail bags, a man had presented himself, asking if there was anything for Mme. Andre!

He flew rather than ran to the office of the coach which carried passengers from the nearest station on the railway to the chief town. George Andre had arrived, but had set out immediately on foot for his village.

The news gave Martin a violent shock. The prospect of a catastrophe for which he would be responsible arose before him. He saw this man who had returned with joy in his heart, encountering death at the threshold of his home through his fault, and misfortune overtaking the widow and orphans. The darkest clouds troubled his imagination.

He did not hesitate, and, without taking time to enter his dwelling, started off again. Those who saw him pass, absorbed in his thoughts and noticing no one around him, asked themselves what grave affair could have caused this breathless haste on the part of a man who must have come back from his round broken by fatigue.

After having passed over a fourth of the distance he inquired concerning the traveler, and asked if he had been seen.

He had gone by some time before. The joy of return had given wings to his feet, as the thought of misfortune to be averted had increased the speed of the postman. There was no longer even the shadow of a doubt; the fated man had taken the path which led straight to the Moulin-Brule. Pere Martin calculated that, by crossing over another path, which, however, was rough and dangerous, he could yet arrive before him.

He hastened on and reached the fatal spot when the night was already advanced. The place was well fitted up for an ambuscade. There was a species of cut through the rocks. On both sides bushy trees formed an impenetrable shade, rapidly moving clouds at each instant veiled the moon, the wan rays of which added to the sinister character of the landscape.

He paused; amid the rustling of the foliage agitated by the wind he thought he heard the sound of approachin footsteps; it was doubtless George Andre, whom he had preceded only by a few instants; he was about going to meet him, when the report of a gun rang out and a ball struck him full in the breast.

The assassin emerged from a neighboring thicket, but on approaching his victim to finish and rob him he found himself in the presence of a new actor and vented his disappointment in a horrible oath; he had recognized George Andre. The blade of a knife flashed in his hand, but he was not allowed time to use it—a club descended vigorously upon his head and felled him to the ground.

"Oh! how wretched I am!" cried she. "I foresaw; he has killed him!"

Madame Andre had not been able to subdue her uneasiness, and, at the hour she supposed her husband ought to arrive, she had come to wait for him; at the report of the gun, she had run forward precipitately.

"Jeanne," said her husband to her, "reassure yourself; I am unhurt."

"It was not you? Who then has he assassinated?"

They bent over Martin's body and recognized him in the moonlight which at that instant illuminated his face and uniform.

The husband and wife carried him to their home, where he lived only twenty-four hours. He related how he had allowed to be stolen from him the letter in which George Andre had announced his return, and how he had decided to prevent at any price the consequences of his negligence, even if he should be compelled to offer his life in exchange for that of the father of a family whom he had involuntarily helped to place in peril.

Obscure victim of duty, he had added another act to the list of those unknown sacrifices which are made daily, without being encouraged by the hope of recompense, without even having for indemnification the remembrance they should leave behind them.

Such a Getting Up Stairs.

There is a man in the Seventh Ward that is probably the meanest man in this country. He had rather play a joke on his family than to pay a note. His people, the women folks, are as afraid as death of fire-arms, and when there was so much talk about toy pistols killing children, they worried their lives out nearly, for fear the little five-year-old would get hold of one of them and blow a lot of his thumbs off. The family was away for a week or two, leaving this mean man and the little boy at home, and from all reports the man and the boy had a healthy old time. This mean man is a great sportsman, and he has a neat little revolver that he can kill a rat with four times out of five. While the family was away he got a lot of blank cartridges for the revolver, and he and the young hopeful used to go down in the basement and fire blank cartridges at the furnace door. The little fellow got so he could shoot blank cartridges like a hero, and he promised not to tell anybody that papa had been teaching him to shoot, though he was as proud of his proficiency as could be. The family got back, and one evening there were two or three ladies in to spend the evening.

The party missed the mean man and the little boy. The mean man loaded the revolver with blank cartridges and told the little fellow they would have some fun. He fixed the little fellow up like an Indian, and told him to take the revolver and go in the sitting-room and yell, "whoop," and fire the whole seven cartridges. It was a picnic for the little fellow. He came up out of the basement, opened the door and "whooped," and began to fire. They were talking about trimming night gowns, or some such innocent pastime, when the firing commenced. The mother of the child recognized him, and started to take the revolver away, but he pointed at her and fired a second shot, and got behind a rocking chair and kept blazing away. The mother thought she was killed and fell over a hassock and rolled under a table. One of the lady callers got up on a sofa and pulled up her skirts so, if there had been bullets in the revolver every one of them would have hit her. Another got behind the stove and held an evening paper up before her, and they all yelled murder. The grandfather was sewing carpet-rags, and at the first fire he dropped a stitch and fell over a cuspidore and began to say his prayers. An old lady who had come in to borrow some goose oil, run up stairs and got into the bath-room and locked herself in. As the last shot was fired at the cat, which was trying to get under the stove, the mean man came in, and calling the boy by name said, "Hello, having some fun with the visitors, eh?" and he coolly took the revolver and put it in his pocket and asked if any of them were hit. They all said they were hit, and, do you know, that mean man actually pretended he thought they were wounded, and went probing around for the bullets. Then he told them it was only a lot of blank cartridges, and that he and the boy had been practicing for two weeks, and then the women went at him and came near pulling all the hair out of his head, because he was mean enough to search them for bullets. Some men, who have never run for office even, are meaner than Pusley.—Peck's Sun

A party of boys were sitting together telling yarns, when finally the conversation turned on promotions. A German cavalryman gave the following:

"I'll tell you something about that, boys. When I joined the cavalry I hadn't been long in this country and didn't understand English very well. We were sent up the valley at the battle of Winchester and ordered to charge a battery. Well, the Captain gave the order to charge and away we went in fine style. The Johnnies opened on us with grape and canister. Many a horse tumbled over, and plenty of saddles were emptied. That didn't make any difference; we went straight ahead. Suddenly the Captain gave the order to retreat. The whole company turned and went back as fast as they could except me. You see I didn't understand the order, so I kept on and charged right in amongst them; and, by Joe! I captured the whole battery and brought it off safe myself. Now I'll tell you how it turned out. The next day the Captain was made a Major. The First Lieutenant was made Captain, and—"

"Well, what did they do for you?" asked the listener.

"Why, they put me in the guard-house, because I wouldn't tell a lie."

Miss Alice Ilgenfritz stated in an address on journalism to the Fourth Iowa District Press Association, that she thinks there is still room at the top, and that a neglect of literary finish is one of the faults of our newspapers. Instead of dwelling on and polishing up their ideas, men think more of making advantageous sale of them. The following from Miss Alice's address exhibits the results of too much literary finish: "I am thankful for the inconoclastic spades which are rooting up old saws that have become stripped of all significance, like Cleopatra's Needle, by being removed from their natural surroundings." As the New York Sun remarks—"Fie, fie, Miss Alice."

A REMARKABLE STATEMENT.

The Unusual Experience of a Prominent Man Made Public.

The following article from the Democrat and Chronicle, of Rochester, N. Y., is of so striking a nature, and emanates from so reliable a source, that it is herewith republished entire. In addition to the valuable matter it contains it will be found exceedingly interesting:

To the Editor of the Democrat and Chronicle:

Sir: My motives for the publication of the most unusual statements which follow are, first, gratitude for the fact that I have been saved from a most horrible death, and, secondly, a desire to warn all who read this statement against some of the most deceptive influences by which they have ever been surrounded. It is a fact that to-day thousands of people are within a foot of the grave and they do not know it. To tell how I was caught away from just this position and to warn others against nearing it, are my objects in this communication.

On the first day of June, 1881, I lay at my residence in this city, surrounded by my friends and waiting for death. Heaven only knows the agony I then endured, for words can never describe it. And yet if, a few years previous, any one had told me that I was to be brought so low, and by so terrible a disease, I should have scoffed at the idea. I had always been uncommonly strong and healthy, had weighed over 200 pounds, and hardly knew, in my own experience, what pain or sickness were. Very many people who will read this statement realize at times that they are unusually tired, and cannot account for it. They feel dull and indefinite pains in various parts of the body, and do not understand it. Or they are exceedingly hungry one day, and entirely without appetite the next. This was just the way I felt when the relentless malady which had fastened itself upon me first began. Still I thought it was nothing; that probably I had taken a cold which would soon pass away. Shortly after this I noticed a dull, and at times neuralgic, pain in my head, but as it would come one day and be gone the next, I paid but little attention to it. However, my stomach was out of order, and my food often failed to digest, causing, at times, great inconvenience. Yet I had no idea, even as a physician, that these things meant anything serious or that a monstrous disease was becoming fixed upon me. Candidly, I thought I was suffering from malaria, and so doctored myself accordingly. But I got no better. I next noticed a peculiar color and odor from the fluids I was passing—also that there were large quantities one day and very little the next, and that a persistent froth and scum appeared upon the surface and a sediment settled at the bottom. And yet I did not realize my danger, for, indeed, seeing these symptoms continually, I finally became accustomed to them, and my suspicion was wholly disarmed by the fact that I had no pain in the afflicted organs or in their vicinity. Why I should have been so blind I cannot understand.

There is a terrible future for all physical neglect, and impending danger usually brings a person to his senses even though it may then be too late. I realized, at last, my critical condition and aroused myself to overcome it. And, Oh! how hard I tried! I consulted the best medical skill in the land. I visited all the prominent mineral springs in America and traveled from Maine to California. Still I grew worse. No two physicians agreed as to my malady. One said I was troubled with spinal irritation; another, nervous prostration; another, malaria, another, dyspepsia; another, heart disease, another, general debility; another, congestion of the base of the brain; and so on through a long list of common diseases, the symptoms of all of which I really had. In this way several years passed, during all of which time I was steadily growing worse. My condition had really become pitiable. The slight symptoms I at first experienced were developed into terrible and constant disorders—the little twigs of pain had grown to oaks of agony. My weight had been reduced from 207 to 130 pounds. My life was a torture to myself and friends. I could retain no food upon my stomach, and lived wholly by injections. I was a living mass of pain. My pulse was uncontrollable. In my agony I frequently fell upon the floor, convulsively clutched the carpet and prayed for death. Morphine had little or no effect in deadening the pain. For six days and nights I had the death-premonitory hiccoughs constantly. My urine was filled with tube casts and albumen. I was struggling with Bright's Disease of the Kidneys in its last stages.

While suffering thus I received a call from my pastor, the Rev. Dr. Foote, rector of St. Paul's Church, of this city. I felt that it was our last interview, but in the course of conversation he mentioned a remedy of which I had heard much, but had never used. Dr. Foote detailed to me the many remarkable cures which had come under his observation, by means of this remedy, and urged me to try it. As a practicing physician and a graduate of the schools, I cherished the prejudice both natural and common with all regular practitioners, and derided the idea of any medicine outside the regular channels being the least beneficial. So solicitous, however, was Dr. Foote, that I finally promised I would waive my prejudice and try the remedy he so highly recommended. I began its use on the first day of June and took it according to directions. At first it sickened me; but this I thought was a good sign for one in my debilitated condition. I continued to take it; the sickening sensation departed, and I was able to retain food upon my stomach. In a few days I noticed a decided change for the better, as also did my wife and friends. My hiccoughs ceased, and I experienced less pain than formerly. I was so rejoiced at this improved condition that, upon what I had believed but a few days before was my dying-bed, I vowed, in the presence of my family and friends, should I recover I would both publicly and privately make known this remedy for the good of humanity, wherever and whenever I had an opportunity. I also determined that I would give a course of lectures in the Corinthian Academy of Music of this city, stating in full the symptoms and almost hopelessness of my disease, and the remarkable means by which I have been saved. My improvement was constant from that time, and in less than three months I had gained 26 pounds in flesh, became entirely free from pain, and I believe I owe my life and present condition wholly to Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, the remedy which I used.

Since my recovery I have thoroughly reinvestigated the subject of kidney difficulties and Bright's disease, and the truths developed are astounding. I therefore state deliberately and as a physician that I believe MORE THAN ONE-HALF THE DEATHS WHICH OCCUR IN AMERICA ARE CAUSED BY BRIGHT'S DISEASE OF THE KIDNEYS. This may sound like a rash statement, but I am prepared to fully verify it. Bright's Disease has no distinctive symptoms of its own (indeed, it often develops without any pain whatever in the kidneys or their vicinity), but has the symptoms of nearly every other known complaint. Hundreds of people die daily, whose burials are authorized by a physician's certificate of "Heart Disease," "Apoplexy," "Paralysis," "Spinal Complaint," "Rheumatism," "Pneumonia," and other common complaints, when in reality it was Bright's Disease of the Kidneys. Few physicians, and fewer people, realize the extent of this disease or its dangerous and insidious nature. It steals into the system like a thief, manifests its presence by the commonest symptoms, and fastens itself upon the constitution before the victim is aware. It is nearly as hereditary as consumption, quite as common and fully as fatal. Entire families, inheriting it from their ancestors, have died, and yet none of the number knew or realized the mysterious power which was removing them. Instead of common symptoms, it often shows none whatever, but brings death suddenly, and as such is usually supposed to be heart disease. As one who has suffered, and knows by bitter experience what he says, I implore every one who reads these words not to neglect the slightest symptoms of Kidney difficulty. Certain agony and possible death will be the sure result of such neglect, and no one can afford to hazard such chances.

I am aware that such an unqualified statement as this, coming from me, known as I am throughout the entire land as a practitioner and lecturer, will arouse the surprise and possible animosity of the medical profession and astonish all with whom I am acquainted, but I make the foregoing statements based upon facts which I am prepared to produce and truths which I can substantiate to the letter. The welfare of those who may possibly be sufferers such as I was, is an ample inducement for me to take the step I have, and, if I can successfully warn others from the dangerous path in which I once walked, I am willing to endure all professional and personal consequences.

Woman Held Responsible.

Recently the Indianapolis Herald contained a short paragraph to the effect that "the severest critics on woman's shortcomings are women" to which a lady reader of that paper has taken exception in the following sarcastic manner:

"Eve was blamed in the beginning, and her daughters will be blamed till the end for every misstep, and criticised for every fault by both her own and the opposite sex. Woman criticises woman severely, and for no other reason but to win favor in the eyes of the wretch who made her sister a subject of comment and to show her strength of mind. Had Adam been a man, as the Lord intended, and not a contemptible scoundrel, women's position in this world would have been different; she would not always be taking a back seat in the theatre of life, and dancing while somebody else whistled; she would not be shunned as a leper and hissed at as a counterfeit for the same sins man is guilty of, and publicly forgiven by virtuous, but narrow minded women, and lauded by men, who are so imbued with the faults of their ancestor that they forgot what they owe to women—for their mother's sake. If Adam had not been a coward and a knave, when the Lord called unto them to come out of their place of concealment, after having partaken of the fruit of knowledge, he would would have come boldly forth and said: "Lo, and behold, Master, I alone am to blame, being the stronger; let not thy wrath fall upon the wife Thou hast given ME!" But, instead, he crawled out, like a dog with wool in his teeth, and pointing derisively at Eve, said: "Lo, and behold the woman Thou gavest to be with me; she gave me of the tree and I did eat," and Eve, not wishing to make her husband out a liar, hung her head and said nothing, until the Lord said: "What is this thou hast done?" Then she replied: "The serpent (meaning Adam, of course) beguiled me, and I did eat." But, mind you, she did not lay the blame on her husband, as he, unchristian-like, had done upon her; which in my eyes prove her innocence. I never did believe, I never can believe, I never will believe that Eve ever pulled that miserable apple, all Bible translators to the contrary notwithstanding. Of course, after the Lord cursed them, Eve, broken-hearted at the false accusation of her husband, never felt like holding up her head again, consequently he petted and tyrannized over her as suited his fancy, instilling in her mind the disgrace of weakness in woman, the nobility and generosity of man—the loyalty of his own heart and forbearance in not applying for a divorce as soon as cast out of Eden, until the poor woman was so muddled that she didn't know half the time if she stood on her head or heels, scourging herself for imaginary sins, while she loved and despised the man who accused her. No wonder that her daughters have inherited their traits. Like mother, like daughter; like father, like son.

"Adam and Eve will live throughout time—the woman will be cursed for the sins of the man, at least, for which he is equally or like guilty. But the better day is coming, even if it is after she is dead, for women. The Lord is finding out a thing or two, and knows he made a mistake when Adam was created first. Woman will inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, not for sins or forgiveness of sister woman, but for the ability and forbearance, love and honor she exhibits in shielding man, in tagging around after him, in smoothing over his weak points, and nursing the corrupt infant as if he were her own. The Lord is ashamed of his irreparable error, and woman will receive her reward."

Driving With the Parasol.

The other evening the Jester was bathing his eyes in cold water, and suspended the operation long enough to remark:

"If a woman can't take her parasol to heaven when she dies, she won't be happy there. She will come back after it."

An impressive quiet followed this dogmatic statement, and the parasols of the court knew some of them were in for it.

"We were driving this afternoon," the aggrieved Jester resumed, "and the princess kindly shaded my head with her parasol. It was very, kind indeed. It limited my view of the country, at times, to my knees and the dashboard of the wagon. Whenever we met a team, especially if the road was very narrow, the princess lowered the parasol between myself and the passing wagon, so that I turned out by faith, or stood on my head to get a glimpse of the colliding wheels. When we started down a steep hill she dropped the parasol between me and the horses, and I trusted to the good sense of the animals to keep out of the ditch. When we met any acquaintance to whom I wished to bow, she knocked my hat into my eyes. When she would point my admiring gaze to some exquisitely tinted autumn leaves, she jabbed a projecting parasol into my eye. When she turned to speak to any one in the rear seat, she rasped the back of my neck. Oft as the carriage struck a stone or lurched over a rut she prodded my long-suffering head with vicious little jabs. I drew my head down between my shoulders and sat crouched and bent, but the remorseless parasol still persued me. I have been pelted and rasped and prodded, and all from a mistaken sense of kindness. A woman's unselfishness and kindness of heart always prompts her to hold her parasol over the man who drives. And if the man who drives is allowed to choose for himself he will choose sunstroke in preference to the parasol every time. I do not complain, mind you; I merely make a simple statement of plain fact. Any man who has had to drive a pair of horses while some gentle-hearted woman held a parasol over him knows what I have suffered. And when she holds an umbrella it is infinitely worse. Then the man is utterly and hopelessly extinguished and the material world is to him only a wild blank chaos of alpaca and whalebone."

SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY.

CERTAIN species of animals have regular cemeteries to which they repair to die. The South American llama, for instance, has its district cemeteries, in which bones are found in great numbers.

IN EXPERIMENTS to determine the depth beneath the surface of the sea to which sight could penetrate, twenty-five fathoms was found to be the limit of visibility. It was also found that the water is most transparent when its temperature is highest.

AN EXTRAORDINARY interest is manifested in the Polar regions this year, two expeditions being now en route to that locality from the United States, one each from Norway and Sweden and Denmark, a private one from England and an official one from France.

THE stinging hairs of the nettle contain glands at their bases which secrete the poison felt when a nettle is touched. The slightest touch breaks the point and allows the poison fluid to pass out. Under a microscope the contents of the hair are seen to be in a state of constant motion.

AN ENORMOUS electro-magnet has been made for the University of Greifswald. The case is formed of twenty-eight iron plates bent into horse-shoe shape and connected by rings so as to form a cylinder eight inches in diameter. The hight is four feet, and the weight about fourteen hundred pounds.

THE Rev. Dr. McCook has noticed a black "carpenter ant," which is capable of effecting great destruction in woodwork, contrary to the general belief that ants outside the tropics are harmless practically. He has seen a rafter in which this species, the Formica Pennsylvanica had penetrated to the extent of five or six feet of its length, completely honeycombing it. It is evident that such penetration of wooden structures, and especially bridges, might cause their disastrous and unexpected fall.

ONE of the most decided impressions which non-scientific people must receive from the visit of the great comet of 1881 is that of the ignorance of science concerning these mysterious visitants. Whence they come or whither they go are problems none can solve; while the unfulfilled predictions of the return of certain comets show that calculations in regard to the motions of these bodies partake much of the nature of guesses. With all the skill and telescopic penetration of our astronomers they cannot yet trace the course of the comet, which in a few days passes across the immeasurable expanse of space viewed from this earth and disappears in the depths beyond, to wander perhaps for thousands of years before completing the cycle of its journey and returning to a point in its orbit near the earth.

IN a recent paper Mr. C. Shaler Smith has given the results of extensive observations in relation to the pressure exerted by the wind. The most violent storm recorded by him was at East St. Louis, in 1871, when the wind overturned a locomotive, the maxium force developed in so doing being no less than 93 pounds to the square foot. At St. Charles, 1877, a jail was destroyed, the wind force required being 84 pounds per square foot. At Marshfield, in 1880, a brick mansion was leveled, the force necessary being 58 pounds per square foot. Below these extraordinary pressures, Mr. Smith instances numerous cases of trains blown off rails, bridges, etc., blown down by gales of wind of 24 to 31 pounds per square foot. In all the examples the lowest force required to do the observed damage has has been taken as the maxium force of the wind, although, of course, it may have been higher.

"I have some peculiar customers," the keeper of a bird and pet-animal store in Fulton street said. "There are some ladies that purchase nothing but white rats. I once asked one what she did with them. She blushed a little and said she let them sleep on her pillow with her. She fondled them and taught them little tricks. I have had quite a demand for young alligators recently. Most of the purchasers, curiously enough, are ladies. You wouldn't think there was anything particularly likeable in an alligator, with a mouth running nearly half the length of his body, but some ladies think so. I have seen them throw bits of meat into an aquarium containing a six-inch alligator, and, as his mouth flapped open and closed on the delicacy, they would raise their hands and exclaim; 'How perfectly lovely!' They use the alligators to look at and feed. An alligator looks very comical when about to swallow a fly. He rushes at it with open jaws, and brings them so violently together that the water spouts out at each side of his mouth. He gets himself in the most grotesque attitudes, and is always making unexpected moves. A woman came here from Hoboken, recently, and bought a ten-inch reptile. She also bought two dollars' worth of fishes. She went away apparently pleased with her purchases. Several days afterward she came again and said that all her fishes had mysteriously disappeared the night she took them home, but that the alligator still remained. She said she had put them all together in an aquarium. Of course I told her the alligator had swallowed the fishes. She said, 'Oh, my, the nasty thing!' and vowed she would sell it. An alligator over four inches long is dangerous in an acquarium. Most of those I sell are from Florida. It takes a long time—more than two years sometimes—for an aquarium-bred alligator to grow two inches. If they were left to burrow in a muddy pond or a swamp they would grow nearly twice their length in a year. Fresh water seems to stunt them."—N. Y. Sun.

New Boat's Mast.

To reduce the weight of masts of racing yachts, it has been the custom to bore out the heart of the stick for the whole or a part of its length. While lightness is thus gained, strength has been lost, and, to compensate for this loss, a new form of hollow mast has been recently tried. The stick was carefully cut into two equal parts, and then the interior was gouged out in short sections. Spaces were left uncut between the sections, so that when the two parts were put together the stick would be an exact copy of the interior of a rod of bamboo, the stem of which is hollow, and re-enforced at short distances by thick rings of woody matter that nearly close the tube made by the stem. This form of structure is light and yet very strong, and it is claimed that this form of mast will be stronger than the usual hollow mast, and very nearly as strong as a solid mast. The two parts are fastened together by putting in dowels at the re-enforced places. When finished, the mast is smooth on the outside, and gives no intimation of its internal structure.—Century Magazine.

A Trickster Tricked.

Even Hermann, the greatest of all living tricksters, and whose conversance with the black art should, one would think, place him beyond the possibility of being on the wrong side of a trick, is himself once in a while victimized in a manner that raises a loud laugh. In his programme he introduces his marvelous cabinet, a large institution like a two-story refrigerator, with double doors opening so as to expose the whole interior, which is cross-barred in the manner made familiar to the public in the construction of tables for living heads and half women. In this cabinet he secretes a sailor, who mysteriously disappears, although the audience can see under and all around the affair, and two gentlemen are sitting on the stage within three yards of it. The sailor cannot possibly leave the cabinet without being seen, and the trick consists in so disposing of the panels of the interior that, although the doors are swung wide, the eye cannot detect any change in the appearance of the compartment. There are several variations of the trick. The sailor instantly releases himself from a pair of stocks when looked inside. He also gets out of a securely fastened and rope-bound trunk, and there are numerous hands shown at the openings in the doors, but the most marvelous feature of the whole thing is the appearance of a little darkey in the auditorium less than a minute after he has been hustled into the cabinet. The trick went well enough until this stage of the performance was reached. The darkey was rushed into the cabinet; Hermann opened the doors a moment afterwards and the boy was gone.

"Bo-y! Bo-y!" the magician shouted. "W'ere you, bo-y?"

But no "bo-y" showed up in the auditorium. The call was repeated a number of times, and Hermann was at last almost in despair. At last one of the ushers ran up the parquet aisle, making directly for the magician.

The usher grabbed the magician's left ear and whispered a few hurried words into it. He told him that the black boy was then on his way to the calaboose in the arms of a tall policeman, and would not be able to finish his share of the trick until he was bailed out. Hermann could not be more astonished if he had been struck with a brick. He slammed the doors of the cabinet angrily, told the audience that his "bo-y" had been arrested by a police officer, and he would have to bring the trick to a close without the usual triumphant denouement.

The explanation of the difficulty is very easy: The darkey, a smart fourteen-year-old boy, whom Hermann had secured in Memphis, in making his way out of the cabinet runs for the back door of the stage, and then, with the fleetness of a two-legged Iroquois, flies through the alley and around the corner into the entrance of the theater just in time to answer "Here I am" to the magician's "Bo-y, we're air you?" As he darted out of the alley the boy ran into an officer's arms. The policeman, imagining that the little fellow had stolen something, carried him off to the station, wholly unconscious of the fact that he had quite spoiled one of Hermann's best tricks.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Some Memorable Dark Days.

During the last hundred years there have been an unusually large number of dark days recorded. As has been suggested by several writers, this may have been the result of the careful scientific observations of modern times, as well as of the frequency of these phenomena. The dark day in the beginning of this century about which so much has been said and written occurred October 21, 1816. The first day of the same month and year is also represented as "a close dark day." Mr. Thomas Robie, who took observations at Cambridge, Mass., has this to offer in regard to the phenomenon: "On October 21 the day was so dark that people were forced to light candles to eat their dinners by; which could not be from an eclipse, the solar eclipse being the fourth of that month." The day is referred to by another writer as "a remarkable dark day in New England and New York," and it is noted, quaintly by a third that "in October, 1816, a dark day occurred after a severe winter in New England." November 26, 1816, was a dark day in London, and is described "in the neighborhood of Walworth and Camberwell so completely dark that some of the coachmen driving stages were obliged to get down and lead their horses with a lantern." The famous dark day in America was May 19, 1780. The phenomenon began about 10 o'clock in the forenoon. The darkness increased rapidly, and "in many places it was impossible to read ordinary print." There was widespread fear. Many thought that the Day of Judgment was at hand. At that time the Legislature of Connecticut was in session at Hartford. The House of Representatives, being unable to transact their business, adjourned. A proposal to adjourn the council was under consideration. When the opinion of Colonel Davenport was asked, he answered: "I am against an adjournment. The day of judgment is approaching or it is not. If it is not, there is no cause for adjournment; if it is, I choose to be found doing my duty. I wish, therefore, that candles may be brought." In Whittier's "Tent on the Beach" is given a beautiful poetical version of this anecdote. It is suggested by several authorities that the cause of the dark day in 1780 should be attributed simply to the presence of ordinary clouds of very unusual volume and density. These instances are, of course, grouped with phenomena of which not a great deal is known, and can in no way be classed with those occurrences occasioned by the smoke from extensive forest fires, volcanic eruptions, or fogs.

A Deserted City.

Situated on a beautiful bay which sets in from the Gulf of Mexico, and indents the western coast of Florida writes a Florida correspondent, there flourished about 1817 the prosperous city of St. Joseph. It had many attractions. The location was charming and the climate delightful. At that time it was fast becoming a business centre. The first railroad in the State was built from St. Joseph to a point on the Chattahoochie river, the fine harbor for shipping being the inducement, and large quantities of cotton were sent from northern Florida and Alabama to be shipped to northern and European ports. Receiving and transferring these large amounts of cotton was the chief industry of the place, and made business very active during the winter months. Capital was invested in warehouses, stores, docks, etc. Just as prosperity and happiness seemed assured, the yellow fever made its appearance, sweeping the place like a scourge. This was the summer of 1841. Whole families died in the midst of their lonely surroundings. Many fled terrified and never returned, seeking their fortunes anew elsewhere. Business firms and families were broken up or wholly destroyed and the city was left a scene of wreck and ruin. Five years later it presented a melancholy spectacle and strikingly picturesque. The skeleton warehouses, costly and capacious houses, now doorless and windowless, rose like spectres on every side, many of the houses being almost buried in a tangled mass of vines, flowers and shrubs, cultivated and wild. Now and then parties of hunters from a distance would take possession of some one of these ruins as headquarters, while seeking deer and other game with which the woods not far off abounded. But after a while even these occasional visitors ceased, as the place became more and more isolated. The last residents were an old man and his daughter, who lived entirely alone, subsiting on the resources of their garden, the fish of the lake and the game of the woods, and depending for other necessaries on the sale of shell-work, made from the exquisitely fine shells found in abundance along the lovely beach to which they made occasional trips to a point twenty-five miles distant. At last the old man and his daughter left, and none now remain to tell the story of a once bright and promising city.

THE AGE OF MIRACLES

It is, however, unsurpassed both as a pectoral and alterative, and will cure obstinate and severe diseases of the throat and lungs, coughs and bronchial affections. By virtue of its wonderful alterative properties it cleanses and enriches the blood, cures pimples, blotches and eruptions, and causes even great eating ulcers to heal.

A Truly Devoted Wife.

A woman in New Orleans found her husband lying in a state of intoxication in an alley. Instead of being exasperated, she gently turned him over to a comfortable position, and running her hand into his vest pocket, she extracted a twenty dollar bill, and remarked: "I reckon I've got the deadwood on that new bonnet I've been sufferin' for." She made a straight streak for the millinery shop. Strong men wiped the moisture from their eyes at her heroic devotion to a husband who had, by strong drink, brought himself so low as to neglect to provide his wife with the common necessaries of life.—New Orleans Times.

The Sphere of Woman.

As republican institutions continue to gain ground, women appear more conspicuous in the remodeling influences of civilization.

She, whose presence in this briery world is as a lily among thorns, whose smile is pleasant, like the light of morning, and whose eye is the gate of heaven; she whom nature so reveres that the lovely value of her spirit is the best terrestrial emblems of beauty, ceases to command armies or sit upon imperial thrones. But the world bows in homage to her scepter of forbearance and love.

The progress of liberty owes much to her self-sacrifice and devotion. It has also redeemed her into the possession of her nature, has made her not man's slave, but his companion, his counsellor and fellow martyr; and lifted her to domestic equality, and demands for her the same privileges in political affairs.

Although many of the avenues of public life are closed against her, she is demonstrating her worthiness to fill a wider sphere of usefulness than she has ever occupied. Truth in its purity finds no more honest or industrious interpreter.—Bancroft.

An Excellent Suggestion.

"We have had occasion several times to commend the enterprise of publishers in providing historical and descriptive works with suitable maps of the territory concerned. We wish now to urge upon them the importance of providing novels of a certain class with maps likewise. A novel which is purely domestic in its interior and imaginative in its scope, needs no such equipment; but in a novel which has a geographical theater, and seeks to produce the effects of reality, a map may serve as a powerful aid to the reader. By all means, let publishers give us novels which have any geographical basis."

The same idea has probably suggested itself to many as they laid aside the historical novel to look up the locality in a large atlas.

Get Out Doors.

RESCUED FROM DEATH.

William J. Coughlin, of Somerville, Mass., says: In the fall of 1876 I was taken with bleeding of the lungs, followed by a severe cough. I lost my appetite and flesh, and was confined to my bed. In 1877 I was admitted to the hospital. The doctors said I had a hole in my lung as big as a half dollar. At one time a report went around that I was dead. I gave up hope, but a friend told me of DR. WILLIAM HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS. I got a bottle, when, to my surprise, I commenced to feel better, and to-day I feel better than for three years past. Cats of History.

A. C. Swinburne writes to the London Spectator—I send you two stories, as they were told to my boyhood, of cats connected with my family—in which, I may add, cat worship has been for centuries a hereditary legacy. One, when its master was lying wounded nigh to death, watched for many days and nights at the door of his room; it would not be lured or driven away till at last it was possible for the convalescent to receive his faithful and inconsolable friend, whose ecstacy may—or, rather, may not—be imagined. So much for the charge of personal indifference brought against cats by those who prefer the promiscuous and obtrusive caresses or solicitations lavished by dogs on almost any stranger, to the choice and constant affection which cats, with the instinct peculiar to babies and themselves, reserve with such scrupulous self-respect for those in whom they recognize a true reciprocal attraction—an unmistakable innate affinity.

My second story illustrates only that attachment to places which is more commonly recognized as a feline property, but illustrates it in so singular a degree that it may, perhaps be thought worthy of this passing record. A favorite cat—I know not whether the same was the hero or heroine of the story just given—was conveyed to London from a country house in the depth of Northumberland, and missed immediately after arrival. About a week afterward it arrived at its old home, half starved and wholly fallen from its high estate as a cat of quality and distinction, but recognizable by the household left in charge, having smelt or inquired its way back on foot along a course of some 300 miles, which it had just before traversed in a carriage for the first time.

AUBURN, IND., January 19, 1882.

THE originator of those familiar words, "Hold the fort, for we are coming," Ex-Judge McKinzie, died last Monday at Hampton, Iowa.

THE Illinois state board of health has ordered all the scholars and teachers in that state to be vaccinated, as small-pox is on the increase.

IT is understood in political circles, that Ex-Congressman De La Matyr is anxious to make the race for congress again in his district this year.

LOGAN has introduced a bill into the senate, to have all the tax on whiskey turned into an educational fund, and distributed to the different states.

A BILL has been presented in the French Chamber of Deputies, containing regulations in regard to foreign pork. It excludes sausages and like meats.

REPUBLICAN members of congress from this state are fixing up the slates for the next election of governor of this state. It seems to us that this is either two years too early for the next election, or two years too late for the last one.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL BALDWIN has decided that a resident of a town or city is ineligible to the office of road superintendent of the township in which the town or city is located. Town or city people can not vote for township road superintendent.

ACCORDING to the recent report of the superintendent of the Indianapolis schools, only 36 per cent. of the school population of that city attend the public schools. This is but a little more than one-third of those between six and twenty-one years of age.

SEVERAL hundred traveling men met in convention at the Bates House, Indianapolis, last Saturday. A grand banquet was given them by the wholesale men of that city. Speeches were delivered and poems read, and in the evening a ball closed the festivities.

THERE is great excitement at Hagerstown, this state, over the murder of David H. Smith, an old farmer of Wayne county. His wife and two sons are suspected of the crime, and have been taken to the Richmond jail for safe keeping. They narrowly escaped being lynched.

FARWELL, member from Chicago, has introduced a bill into congress, allowing Americans to purchase and use in foreign commerce iron and steel steamships built in foreign countries. He thinks this would enable our capitalists and seamen to reap a part of the benefits of one hundred millions now paid by Americans to foreign ship owners in the carrying trade.

THE latest news from the Artic steamer "Jeannette," whose crew we are now making such efforts to save, was that she was caught in the ice the first day of October, 1879, and drifted about until June, 1881, when she was abandoned, as it had become apparent that she could not be saved. The boat's crew already rescued, has reached Yakutsk, one of the largest towns in the settled portion of Siberia.

SCOVILLE, in his speech last Monday, charged District Attorney Corkhill, Judge Porter, Mr. Davidge and five of the government experts with conspiring to hang Guiteau. This is probably a ruse to secure the sympathy of the jury for the prisoner, in the hope that he may be leniently dealt with; but our impression may be wrong, as Mr. Scoville has been very fair and candid in his actions, and has conducted the case with great credit to himself.

THERE was a fearful accident on the Hudson River railroad last Friday evening. A train loaded with passengers from Albany to New York, and containing many members of the legislature, was run into, by a special train following them. The persons in the rear car, a sleeper, were jammed in between the seats and some of them killed. The car then took fire, and several were burned to death. At latest accounts, nine had died of their wounds, or been killed outright, and several others are not expected to survive.

A BILL has been introduced into congress, proposing to place all the telegraph lines of the country in the hands of the government. It provides a tariff of twenty-five cents for twenty-five words, including address and signature, for each 1,000 miles, and one-fifth of that rate for each additional ten words, for day telegrams, night messages to be transmitted for one-half of day rates. The bill also provides for the transmission of intelligence to the newspaper press at special rates, and for leasing wires to mercantile boards and other pub-

IN the Smith murder spoken of in another place, one of the sons of the murdered man, has confessed his guilt.

GUITEAU made a short speech on Tuesday. He says that neither Scoville nor Reed can do his case justice, and implores Judge Cox to allow him to address the jury in his own behalf.

A DELEGATION from the Dakota territorial legislature is in Washington trying to have the territory admitted as a state. They propose to divide the state into two parts, calling them North and south Dakota. The southern part is the most populous, and is the portion they wish made into a state.

A FREIGHT train on the Lake Shore road came very nearly being telescoped by a following section last week, near Ligonier. It was quite foggy, and the trains were nearly together before it was noticed. The engineer and fireman sought personal safety by jumping from the engine, but the conductor, happening to be "ahead," put on the steam brake, reversed the engine and brought the train to a stand-still, thereby saving a great amount of property, and, perhaps, several lives. Such pluck should be rewarded.

THERE was a well attended meeting of independent republicans at Philadelphia last week. Two or three hundred delegates were present, representing nearly every section of the state. The object of the meeting was to protest against the management of the republican bosses of the Cameron stripe, who have so long ruled the political field in that state. They adopted resolutions, asserting that they were still republicans, but protesting against the system of machine politics that has so long held sway over the independent voters of the country. They made arrangements to call a state convention, at which time they expect to put a full state ticket into the field.

THERE is a feeling that seems to be gaining ground in Washington, that the star route prosecutions will fall through. The guilty ones are too high up in political circles to run much risk of being punished. It will be remembered, that at a banquet in honor of Dorsey, Arthur, then vice-president, complimented that worthy upon his skillful use of "soap" in carrying the election in Indiana. Our readers, who remember the new two dollar bills with which Dorsey and other republican leaders managed to flood the state, can readily understand the kind of "soap" alluded to by the president of the United States. In view of all these things, it is scarcely to be expected that so useful a politician as Dorsey, Brady and the rest can be spared. And so the country will continue to be robbed with impunity.

THE ice men of Sandusky are now in the field with a petition to congress for a tariff on ice imported into this country. The fact is, our Canadian friends can run the mercury down a little lower than we can, and in an open winter like the present one, can cut ice when we cannot, and can then bring it into this country and sell it at a fair price. But dealers on this side have a certan quantity on hand, and if they can sell this at a high rate, they do not care a fig for the tariff or anything else. When their stock is all gone, the Canadians can come over with their ice, pay a duty on it, and sell it to our consumers. As is always the case, the consumer has the worst of it. He pays a high price for his ice as long as the American dealer has any to sell, and when that is gone, he pays a similar high price to the Canadians for theirs which has paid a high duty. Now, as the proposed duty is $1.00 a ton, that one dollar, and its percentage of profit comes out of the man who uses the ice. The tariff is always a part of the cost of an article, and as retail and other dealers estimate their profit on the cost of a thing, the one dollar per ton of tariff, will bring the dealer an increased profit, and of course, both profit and tariff come out of the consumer. And so on all other articles.

The miserable condition of the Lake Shore passenger house at this place, is commented upon by nearly everybody having occasion to go there. It is certainly an outrage upon the traveling public, to be compelled to endure such facilities (?). It is to be hoped that the company will soon erect such a depot as the town merits.

He has now returned and is making arrangements to go on with the work before him, as soon as definite plans are laid by the commissioners. These latter will be in session in a week or two, when some fixed plan will be adopted, and the entire matter laid before the public.

—We omitted to note the return of Elmer Bumpus last week, from his present stopping place, Kansas City. He came back to stay a while and reduce the swelling on his head, caused by being knocked over onto the caboose stove. He was standing in his caboose, when another car was run down, striking the one in which he was standing, so violently as to dump him against the stove. We are glad to note the fact, that he is all right now.

Their guests left at a late hour, wishing them many anniversaries of a like character. We regret that our space will not permit a more extended notice.

—The small-pox scare is by no means diminishing. From almost every quarter, comes the statement that the disease is on the increase. In a county like ours, traversed by so many railroads, it is necessary to take extra pains to avert the threatened visitations. We believe the best policy for all to adopt, is to be vaccinated. At the same time, all should be cautioned to observe care, not only as to the selection of a competent physician to perform the work, but in taking precautions against taking cold. Children should be watched, lest their natural carelessness should lead them to unnecessary exposure. But if ordinary care is exercised, competent physicians all claim that there is no danger of any injury resulting.

The Boss Watch.

By this we mean the stiffened case watches of the Boss patent for sale at J. Abright's. As even editors must know the time of day, so as to meet the many bills against them on time, and to avoid, when necessary, the importunate "dun" who is to appear at "half-past ten sharp," we have been obliged to yield to the pressure and get a new watch also. We chose the "Boss," and if any one does not believe it a good one, let him take a look at it and the Miller movement within, and then go over to Joe Abright's and do likewise. He is selling them all the time.

Around About Us.

Mr. Husselman has retired from the Auburn Courier, and is succeeded by F. P. Blair, of Waterloo.—[Albion New Era.

D. Y. Husselman has severed his connection with the Auburn Courier, on account of ill health. Mr. F. P. Blair takes his place on that paper. We wish the new firm unbounded prosperity.—[Kendallville Standard.

We are sorry to be compelled to chronicle the fact that the continued ill health of Bro. Husselman has compelled his retirement from the Auburn Courier. Mr. H. is a genial, whole-souled gentleman and a good journalist, and in his retirement the craft loses one of her most energetic workers.—[Butler Record.

By the last issue of the Auburn Courier we notice that our old friend D. Y. Husselman, has quit the business of running a paper, and that a young gentleman, Mr. F. P. Blair takes Mr. H's. place on the Courier. Our best wishes for success to all concerned.—[Columbia City Herald.

At Miller's station, the crossing of the B. & O. and Lake Shore, this side of Chicago, quite a serious collesion occured last Friday night. A train on the Lake Shore road, ran across the track of the B. & O., at the crossing without waiting for the target, the engineer being apparently asleep. He ran directly into a B. & O. freight train that was crossing at the time, completely demolishing a number of cars. We believe no lives were lost.

F. P. Blair has taken up journalism by forming a partnership with Bro. J. A. Barns of the Courier. Mr. Blair although a young man evinces energy and ability, two of the essentials in his chosen calling. The connection with a gentleman of Bro. Barns' experience and ability will be of decided advantage, and no doubt is thoroughly appreciated by Mr. Blair. We wish the new firm success and may the shadow of the Courier never grow less.—[Butler Record.

An article supposed to have been written by a certain citizen, of Wawaka, Noble county, appeared in the Ligonier Leader, a few weeks ago. In it, he gives his reasons for leaving the democratic party, and warns young men of the danger of harboring democratic ideas. The Ligonier Banner of last week, contains quite a lengthy editorial and the efforts of two correspondents in answer to the article contained in the Leader. They make it quite uncomfortable for the old gentleman.

Both parties are in the field after candidates for the spring election. Some one has got to fight a good fight if he does get left.

Hank seems to have the "drop" on some of the friends of the new road across the river. He is feeling exceedingly good since the view.

Frank Draggoo is wrapping up stoves, dress goods, groceries and other commodities for the Barney Bros., and makes himself useful generally.

The little promontory on the St. Joe has the satisfaction of handling all, or nearly so, the merchandise and mail that one of our sister burgs receives.

Henry Hornberger, who has been working here this summer, went home Monday to spend a few days in Waterloo with his family. Mr. H. has proven himself a number one mechanic.

D. M. Allen, of the Maysville Independent, attended the institute Saturday.

Mr. Curie had a number of Indian relics on exhibition at the institute; some of them are quite rare specimens. Such relics should be carefully preserved as mementoes of a race of people to whom this country once belonged.

Township institute here last Friday and Saturday. Nearly all of the teachers were present, and a very pleasant session was held. Teachers present were Misses Alice and Nettie Wise, Miss Laura Shutt, C. H. Brown, Eugene Carper, C. W. Stroh, Mr. Cheeseman, J. E. Dermott and Charles Wiley. Several visitors were present from Allen county, among these being Mr. Shull, the trustee of Scipio township.

As an evidence that the postoffice business for Concord township is not all done at the little burg south of St. Joe, the following is produced from the records of the postoffice at this place:

Received during quarter.......	100.64
Total................	$156.60
Amount on hand at close of quarter.....................	$ 77.04
Amount sold during quarter...	79.56

We do not sport a money order office, but with little difficulty we find that our merchants alone have sent through this office in registered letters, 4,970.-74 dollars. 117 letters were registered. One-half of the amount no account was kept of funds sent. Our postmaster is very modest and don't like to boast, but he thinks he is a head about 5 per cent. on sale of stamps during the quarter. How is it, John, about the little promontory on the St. Joe?

THE EAST.

The shipwrecked crew of the schooner Almon Bird, who were found afloat in an open boat off Cape Ann, had a fearful experience. The boat contained five living and two dead men, the survivors being almost frozen to death, and their faces smeared with the blood they had drawn and drank from the veins of one of their dead comrades. The Original Aesthete.

A New York dispatch says that Oscar Wilde lectured to a large and fashionable audience at Chickering Hall. He was dressed in a black dress coat, white vest extremely low cut, shirt, with flowing white silk cravat, black knee-breeches, brown stockings and slippers. He chose as his subject "The English Renaissance," which he said was the work of esthetics. Decoration, he said, was a science of art, and all teachings would amount to nothing if the workmen were not surrounded by beautiful things. For if they did not see them they could not make them. Art should not be, as in the past, only contrast with surrounding misery. In conclusion he said: "You have all heard of those two flowers dear to the esthetic's heart, the rose and lily; but we do not love them for the reason given by Gilbert, nor for any vegetable preference, but because they are the most perfect specimens of design—the rose, with its leonine beauty, and the lily, the emblem of chastity and purity. Then why look further for the secret of life when the secret of 'life is out?"

THE GUITEAU TRIAL.

THIRTY-NINTH DAY.

The proceedings consisted in an exposition by counsel of the instructions on law points which they asked the Judge to give the jury. Mr. Davidge opened by reading and then elaborating the prayers of the Government, which ask the Judge to instruct the jury that, if the prisoner knew, at the time of the shooting, the difference between right and wrong, he was at that time sane and responsible. Davidge, with the prayers in his hand, said in low but distinct tones and measured language: "And that they consisted first, of the above definition of sanity: second, of the declaration that if the prisoner possessed ability to distinguish between right and wrong, no irresistible passion or impulse, no uncontrollable desire, no normal depravity, would excuse his act; third, a declaration that the standard of insanity must be that of law; fourth, that no delusion, ability to distinguish between right and wrong being present, would excuse the prisoner." He said that the law drew a line of responsibility for crime somewhere. It had not been fully defined until the Judges of England in 1843, at the request of the House of Lords laid down the legal rule defining responsibility. This rule was the good old right-and-wrong test —the rule of common sense. The law drew no line between the low degree of intelligence on one hand and the highest on the other in the respect of the responsibility for crime.

Mr. Reed opened the argument for the defense in advocacy of the prayers presented by them. He premised his remarks by the concession that, in the use of a deadly weapon in such manner as to result in death, the law presumed malice. That need not be discussed. The question whether or not the killing of the President was done with malice was a question entirely and exclusively for the jury. The defense claimed the act was done without malice on the part of the defendant. If the jury had reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, it was their duty to acquit him. They had no discretion. As to insanity, the modern doctrine—the better doctrine —was that if the jury had reasonable doubt of the sanity of the accused at the time of committing the act, it was their duty to find him not guilty. Formerly, the insanity had to be proved by defendant beyond any reasonable doubt.

FORTIETH DAY.

Guiteau opened business by stating that he had received some 800 letters, most of them from ladies, as well as a check for $1,000 from the stalwarts of Brooklyn, and another for $500 from the stalwarts of New York. [Scoville states that the papers are worthless, like one sent him for $15,000.] "I want," said the assassin, "this jury to understand how public opinion is on this case."

A bailiff tried to silence him, when he turned upon him in a most vicious manner and snarled out: "You keep quiet and mind your business. Do not interfere with me when I am talking. If you had any sense you would understand your place."

Scoville then proceeded with his argument. His remarks were listened to with marked attention. He laid stress upon the propositions that insane men often knew the difference between right and wrong, and for that reason conceal their plans, and that the benefit of the doubt should attach to the plea of insanity when raised with the same force as when urged in connection with the commission of a crime. His allusion to the decision of Judge Davis, "who went out of his way," he said, "to pass upon something not involved in the case he was then considering," brought Judge Porter to his feet with an indignant reply that the charge was false.

Scoville retorted that the opinion of a man who sat on the same bench with a Barnard and a Cardozo should not be received with much consideration.

Judge Porter, with even more vehemence, reiterated that the charge of counsel was absolutely false; that Judge Davis never sat on the bench with either of the gentlemen named. "If an honorable member of the Federal judiciary is to be put upon trial here, I demand," said Judge Porter, "that the record be produced here upon which this base charge is made."

Scoville insisted that when the style of proceedings best suited to a police court were introduced here by the prosecution, he should comment upon them as he deemed fitting. He should not be frightened by the tragic utterances of Judge Porter. He had heard the same notes years ago from owls at night in the woods of Ohio.

Alluding to his controversies with Judge Porter, Scoville disclaimed any intention to transgress the bounds of propriety or the rules of practice, but he should criticise the conduct of counsel when it merited criticism, and threats of prosecution would not intimidate him. Citing the custom of counsel upon the other side of bowing to the jury upon entering, Scoville said: "Sometimes it is three bows all round; sometimes more; never less than three. It has never been done by counsel upon this side, and I do not hesitate to criticise the pro[illegible]."

Judge Porter—"The gentleman is simply instancing his lack of politeness. If he has no apology to offer, I shall certainly not apologize for him."

Corkhill next proceeded to read from printed slips an exhaustive argument upon the subject of jurisdiction.

Davidge then discussed at length the question of malice. He also discussed seriatim the prayers of the defense, and pointed out "their sophistries and inconsistencies."

The prisoner followed the argument with the closest attention, and indulged in frequent and noisy comments.

FORTY-FIRST DAY.

At the opening of the trial, Judge Porter began his argument, and at once commanded the attention of every person in the court-room. Writhing under the flagellations administered, the assassin shouted out that he is willing to go to the gallows if it be the Lord's will.

Judge Porter began his address with reference to the disorder which had characterized the proceedings of the defense, and then spoke of Mr. Reed's argument as lawyerlike and based on the only law points which, with any plausibility, could be adduced by the defense. Of Scoville's argument he said it could only have been delivered by one of the family of Guiteau, who, as he had himself boasted, had learned his law in the police courts, and acquired his manners among hooting owls in the woods of Western Ohio. Mr. Porter reviewed the argument of Mr. Davidge, pointing out its strong points. "Malice," Mr. Davidge had rightfully said, "was, in the presumption of law, a question for the Judge, not the jury. Should the Judge decide, as the defense desired, that malice was a question of fact for the jury, he would overturn the law. He would create a precedent in this famous case which would inevitably be condemned through all time to come."

Mr. Scoville had objected that decisions in support of the prosecution's postulate were as antiquated as his (Porter's) style of oratory.

"I never," said Porter, "imitated any man, and never commented on any one's oratory." "I never," said Porter, "sat at the feet of that Gamaliel, as Guiteau did. Whether my manners and morals would have been improved is for others to say. Judging from the disciple who is before you, he would scarcely seem to be an appropriate instructor for youth."

Proceeding to expound the law on the subject of malice, reading from the 1830 edition of Archibald's "Criminal Practice," Porter dwelt upon the premeditation of Guiteau. Referring to his lyings in wait and to his dodging the footsteps of the President, he said: "Was this worthless vagabond the man to be selected and inspired by God, a cheat, a swindler, a creature of vilest habit. He, then, is junior in the firm of Jesus Christ & Co. This murderer, tracking his victim at night, at church, at railroad station, everywhere, till the deed is done. But grant this hideous pretension, and allow him the inspiration of Paul, which he impiously quotes, that does not protect, as it did not protect Paul from stripes and death."

Porter went on to say that although the President had died the Government still lived, and his successor was prosecuting his assassin.

"Yes," said Guiteau, "and Arthur employed you under a misapprehension."

"Yes," said Judge Porter, "under a misapprehension that the law was stronger than Guiteau. Guiteau seems to think that he's stronger than the law."

"I do not claim to be stronger than the law, but God Almighty is stronger than the law," said Guiteau, sullenly.

"You will come before God Almighty presently," said Porter solemnly. Until then he would do well to refer but little to Him. He will feel soon what he has never felt before, the divine pressure in the form of a hangman's noose. The prisoner had sworn on the stand that he was predestined to remove the President. He had forgotten to say he was also predestined to be hung for it. Speaking again of his interruptions, and of the promptings of his family, Porter said he had a supreme contempt for all Guiteaus—not the respectable ones—but those who sympathized with the assassin.

Porter then took up the authorities cited by the defense, pronouncing them either misreported or bad law from obscure benches.

Judge Porter concluded his masterly argument by reading the now famous letter of President Garfield to Judge Payne, in which he complimented and thanked him for brushing away the network of sophistries with which it has of late years been customary to develop the plea of insanity when set up in excuse for crimes.

Judge Cox decided that jurisdiction is complete at the place where a wound is inflicted, and that an appreciation of the difference between right and wrong is the correct test of insanity.

FORTY-SECOND DAY.

Mr. Davidge addressed the jury in behalf of the prosecution. He began by commending the jury for its dignified deportment and patient attention to the evidence throughout the trial. The assassin began a series of interruptions, but, finding he could not disconcert the eloquent advocate, he gradually relapsed into silence.

"In the beginning," said Mr. Davidge, "it was sought to show that the prisoner was off his balance. Now the court tells you to look for that degree of insanity that disables a man from knowing that what he was doing was wrong. This is the test you are to apply. Upon the question of inspiration, I think I will be able to show to your satisfaction how little there is in this claim. The only question," he said, "was that of insanity." He then argued that the prisoner had that degree of intelligence, legal knowledge and the moral sense which rendered him responsible for his acts. In a telling passage he showed that the prisoner himself had the wit to see the fatal weakness of Scoville's line of defense, and repudiated it, arguing in his own behalf that he was no imbecile, but a sane man, whose intellect and will had been dominated during a specified period of time, rendering him irresponsible for this particular crime. He then reviewed the circumstances of the crime, and the victim and the criminal. His analysis of Guiteau's character was graphic and effective. "If," he exclaimed, "I were to sum up the moral and intellectual qualities of this man, I should say that he had the daring of a vulture, combined with the heart of a wolf." In speaking of Guiteau's plan, he remarked upon his greater fear of the mob than of the law, and exclaimed: "We must say, to our shame, that this estimate had a foundation. It rested," he added, "with the jury to show the world whether Guiteau's opinion was well founded. If he had feared the law as he feared the mob, our martyred head and chief would be alive to-day."

Mr. Davidge took up in order the case of each member of the Guiteau family upon whose mental condition evidence had been offered by defense, and recited in connection counter-evidence of the prosecution, summing up the force of this evidence with the remark: "But the unanswerable testimony of experts settles the question how much effect this collateral insanity could have upon the mental condition of the prisoner. It is but the merest mockery to discuss this question, in view of the undoubted ability of this man to distinguish between right and wrong."

Guiteau interrupted once, and shouted: "I have always been a Christian man, and for six years have been strictly virtuous. Don't forget that, either."

Davidge continued: "There is not a single fact, or single jot or tittle, to show that this prisoner was not perfectly responsible for his action on the 2d of July. The jury will find that the defense have carefully picked out and held up to view everything in the entire career of this man which may be considered odd or peculiar, and it is for you to consider how much value can be attached to this evidence, when you come to consider whether this man did not know on the 2d of July that it was wrong for him to kill the Chief Magistrate of the nation." Mr. Davidge then took up the Oneida Community, and spoke of Guiteau's wallowing there for six years.

Guiteau shouted: "And I say it is false. I didn't wallow. I'm just as pure as you are, Davidge, and a good deal purer. I went there to save my soul, not from lust. Put that down, Davidge, and don't you forget it."

Mr. Davidge discussed the evidence of Charles H. Reed, who conversed with the prisoner the Tuesday before the shooting, and who thought he appeared "a little off his balance." "And this, mark you," said Mr. Davidge, "is the extent of his evidence as to that day. He was never asked if he thought he was unable to distinguish between right and wrong. Is it so very strange, gentlemen, that this prisoner should have appeared queer, when at that very time he was carrying in his breast this monstrous crime?"

Counsel dissected, with startling perspicacity, the testimony of one witness after another, and pointed out the weakness and unreliability of those opinions of witnesses for the defense, which had been based in many instances upon the most meager acquaintance.

Before ordering an adjournment Judge Cox asked counsel their wishes in regard to a speech from Guiteau. District Attorney Corkhill protested against his again being allowed to take a seat at the counsel table. Mrs. Scoville wept hysterically. Judge Cox instructed Mr. Scoville to read over the prisoner's manuscript, and report to the court if it contained anything he desired to have go before the jury.

ADDITIONAL NEWS.

Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, has just received the following telegram from our Charge de Affaires at St. Petersburg, respecting the fate of the Jeannette and her crew: "Danenhower and five of the crew of the whale-boat arrived at Zakutsk, Dec. 17. They are comfortably lodged, and all their wants supplied. Melville and six men are expected soon. Capt. De Long and the crew of the first cutter had not been found up to Nov. 16, the last date Boulonenga reported. The Jeannette was caught in the pack Oct. 1, 1879, drifted with the winds and currents till June last, and was then abandoned. Hoffman."

In response to the call issued by Chairman J. D. McKee, of the Independent Republican State Committee, about 200 delegates, representing almost every county in Pennsylvania, met at Philadelphia, for the purpose of discussing the advisability of placing an Independent Republican ticket in the field for State officers, and to formulate some definite action to be pursued by Independent Republicans. It was resolved to hold a State Convention, on the 24th of May, for the nomination of an anti-Cameron ticket.

DOINGS OF CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on the 6th inst., with Mr. Garland in the chair, Mr. Maxey offered a resolution instructing the Secretary of the Interior to furnish a report of the survey of the Texas Boundary Commission in 1858. Mr. Sherman moved to take up his 3-per-cent. Bond bill, but was antagonized by Messrs. Beck and McPherson. A resolution calling for information relative to pension frauds was passed. An interesting and important document was sent to the Senate, accompanied by a communication from the President, calling the earnest attention of Congress to the desirableness of immediate legislation amending the postal laws relating to contracts for the star mail service. It has been discovered that the Government is practically without protection against a wholesale system of worthless bonds submitted by bidders along with their proposals, and that some legislation is necessary to enable the Postoffice Department to examine into the sufficiency of these bonds. During the Brady regime great numbers of these worthless bonds were accepted, and the Government was left without any remedy when the contractors failed to carry out their contracts. The necessity for additional protection in this matter of straw-bonds was brought to notice by Postmaster General James in his explorations in the domain of the star-route frauds, and the President is so strongly impressed with the importance of the subject as to urge upon Congress its immediate consideration. The President nominated to the Senate Samuel C. Parks, of New Mexico, to be Associate Justice in Wyoming, and Joseph Bell, of New York, to be Associate Justice in New Mexico. The Senate adjourned to Monday, 9th. The House was not in session.

The woman-suffrage question assumed a new phase in the Senate on the 9th inst., which may indicate that it is to become a live issue in American politics. On Bayard's amendment to refer the Hoar resolution to create a standing committee on woman suffrage to the Judiciary Committee, the Republicans voted "No" unanimously and the Democrats voted "Aye." Davis, of Illinois, voted with the Republicans. Mr. Teller introduced a bill for the issue of certificates for bullion deposited in the treasury, and Mr. Rollins an act for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma. Mr. Sherman explained his 3-per-cent. bond bill, and earnestly urged its passage. Mr. Logan flung in a proposition to devote to general education all the moneys received by Internal Revenue Collectors from the manufacture or sale of liquors. The President nominated Maj. George B. Schofield to be Lieutenant Colonel of the Sixth Cavalry, and Jack Wharton to be Marshal of the Eastern district of Louisiana. In the House bills were introduced, by Mr. Kasson, for a commission to investigate the tariff and internal revenue laws; by Mr. Caldwell, to repeal the arrears-of-pensions act; by Mr. Page, to make the anniversary of the discovery of America a legal holiday; by Mr. Smith, for the distribution of pure vaccine matter to the people; by Mr. Payson, to make polygamy a disqualification for office in the Territories; by Mr. Henderson, for the construction of the Mississippi and Illinois canal; by Mr. Willis, to reduce letter postage to 2 cents; and by Mr. Cassidy, to restore to the public domain land granted the Northern Pacific road.

In the Senate, on the 10th inst., Mr. Bayard reported favorably the Morrill tariff-commission bill, and pronounced against the Garland measure. He said he favored removing the tariff question from the arena of sectional feeling by selecting civilians for Commissioners. Mr. Beck opposed the Morrill bill as a scheme of monopolists to secure delay. The House took preliminary action on the Utah contest, referring it to the Committee on Elections. From the debate it was evident that among Republicans as well as Democrats there is a disposition to reject Gov. Campbell's certificate because it assumes to decide, not the question of election, but the question of qualification to serve as a member of the House.

A large number of petitions, asking for a commission to inquire into the liquor traffic, were presented in the Senate on the 11th inst., nearly every Senator submitting one or more. Mr. Morgan offered a resolution directing the Committee on Woman Suffrage to report a bill to annul any law conferring upon women in Utah the right to vote. The Sherman funding bill was taken up, and Mr. Vest declared that the Democratic measure of last year would have saved the people $15,000,000 annually in interest; that the payment of the public debt would wipe out national banks, and the latter do not intend to surrender their charters. Mr. Sherman replied that the banks were subject to the will of Congress, and that it is fortunate that the bill of last year failed. Mr. Brown offered a resolution to supply each Senator with a clerk. In the House, Mr. Orth offered a resolution instructing the Committee on Civil-Service Reform to report a different mode of appointing committees. After a spirited contest the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules. Mr. Haskell, as a question of privilege, presented a resolution declaring that no Polygamist is entitled to admission to the House as a delegate, but the House voted that the resolution did not present a privileged question. Mr. Burrows presented a bill to define the qualifications of Territorial delegates, making polygamists ineligible, but Gen. Singleton objected. Mr. Robeson introduced a bill which calls for a return to the Government of lands granted to railroads in those cases where the conditions of the grant have not been fulfilled.

A bill to authorize a bridge across the Missouri river, within five miles of St. Charles, was passed by the Senate on the 12th inst. Mr. Ingalls defended the Arrears-of-Pension act, and offered a resolution against its repeal, which was laid over at the request of Mr. Beck. Mr. Kellogg introduced a bill to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans, and appropriating $200,000 to improve the harbor. A communication was presented from the Chicago Historical Society, asking co-operation in the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the discovery of the mouth of the Mississippi by La Salle. A prolonged debate took place on the 3 per cent. funding bill. Mr. Plumb renewed his amendment requiring the redemption of all United States bonds from the treasury funds in excess of $100,000,000. In the House, Mr. Bayne introduced a bill to sweep away all the bank taxes, and Mr. Browne a measure for the issue and exchange of fractional treasury notes. An appropriation of $540,000 for work on the census was passed. Mr. Browne offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Interior for a statement of the amount annually required for pensions during the next quarter century. Both houses adjourned till Monday, the 16th.

Garfield's Physicians' Fees.

A recent telegram from Washington says, Dr. Bliss has returned from New York, where he met the other physicians of the late President Garfield for consultation relative to their fees. The various sums agreed upon foot up $110,000. It is said that Bliss has taken charge of the claims of all the physicians, and will present them to the Congressional committee. It is understood that he will ask for himself $50,000, for Drs. Agnew and Hamilton $16,000 each, for Dr. Reyburn $8,000, and for Dr. Boynton and Mrs. Dr. Edson $1,000 each. Dr. Woodward and Surgeon General Barnes get nothing, because they were in Government employ, and it is said they are to be promoted by way of recompense for their services. In answer to the question, what was to go to the railroads, a friend of Dr. Bliss remarked that he understood that the Pennsylvania railroad had refused to take anything, and that the State of Ohio would pay some other expenses, amounting to about $200,000.

"Who is Lucifer?" said the teacher to the infant class in Sunday-school. "I know," spoke up a brave 5-year-old girl in a very earnest tone. "Well, tell me, Katie," said the teacher. "W'y, Lucy's fer Bob Spriggs, who has such a funny little mustache, an' wears such a short toat; but papa don't like him at all, an' sez he ain't got no sense an' no money, an' he's fer ole Mr. Grip, an'——" "That will do, Katie," broke in the teacher; "I see you are posted. We will go on to another question," and it required the teacher five minutes to get through using her handkerchief wiping her eyes, she "had such a bad cold, you know," for Lucy was instructing another class near by. Lucy told her mother afterward that she thought Katie too young to go to school, the confinement was not good for her.

Wrestling With Classic Texts.

The story of the circus man who paid a collegian $10 for providing "monohippic aggregation" as a properly impressive title for his show, and then died of a broken heart at the end of the season, when he learned the true meaning thereof, is a story which seems likely to enjoy continued popularity in the following form: "A Boston man had just been showing all the sights of that charming city to a New Yorker. 'And now,' said he, 'tell me honestly, is not this city thoroughly unique?' 'Yes, indeed,' was the reply, 'unus, one, equus, horse.'

With this may be compared the remark of the Sophomore at examination time that if he should lose his pony, he would lose his equilibrium; because,' as he explained to an awe-stricken Freshman, "the word comes from equus and librum, and therefore signifies a horse of books."

Perhaps it was the same Freshman who, in struggling with an ode of Horace, said: "Care Mæcenas eques, Mæcenas, take care of your horse; and was favored with the remark: "Oh, no, Mr. C., you pay too much attention to the horse."

It was another Freshman to whom the instructor said: "You seem to be evolving the translation from your inner consciousness;" and who responded: "Well, Professor, I read last evening that 'by faith Enoch was translated,' and I thought I would try it on Horace."

"Don't you think it would have been necessary to melt her first?" was the perhaps pardonable inquiry of the Professor when a heedless youth twisted the text to say: "And they poured Agrippina into the sea."

"Whose brother?" was the question put to a lady student who construed Ego et frater ambulamus, "I and brother walk;" and that lady student absently responded: "Oh, most anybody's," to the great glee of her co-educational comrades.

"Champagne," was the reckless reply of a Yale man to the inquiry: "In the expression qui vinum fugiens vendat, what does vinum fugiens mean?"

How the Courts Encourage Criminals.

A couple of cattle thieves at San Jose were convicted in 1879 and sentenced to five years' imprisonment in San Quentin. In writing out the verdict a juryman improperly spelled the word defendants. The document read: "We find the defendances guilty." On this quibble the case of one of the thieves was appealed to the Supreme Court. After long pondering on the weighty subject, that august tribunal decided in the thief's favor. The case is not one of striking importance, save that it illustrates what is constantly occurring in our courts. The law no longer inquires: "Is this man a thief? Is he a swindler? Is he a murderer? Did he actually commit the crime he is charged with?" On the contrary, it turns its large manifying glass on the case and practically says: "Is there any possible technicality by means of which this worthless scoundrel can be shielded from punishment? If there is, we want to find it." The law seeks to exclude from the jury-box men who read the daily papers and who are wide awake and intelligent, and, in the case under discussion, nullifies a verdict because, naturally enough, a juryman is too ignorant to spell correctly. A thief is turned loose, not because he is innocent, but because a juryman proves to be ignorant. The juryman was really on trial, at great expense to the public, instead of the thief. The investigation was one concerning orthography and not cattle-stealing, as was erroneously supposed. And this is what they call law in California—an article that costs tax-payers and litigants vasts sums of money annually. Our courts have become arenas in which technical esthetes assemble to split hairs, strain at legal gnats and save the guilty from punishment.—San Francisco Call.

Explosive Balloons

There has long been a suspicion that the pretty little toy balloons of various colors, which children love to convey about the streets at the end of a string, and flaunt in one's face in street cars and railway trains, are not as innocent and harmless as they look, and a recent mishap in London strengthens this suspicion. A gentleman was waiting for a tram car to approach, when one of these balloons, floating in the air behind its proprietor, touched the end of his lighted cigar. A loud explosion instantly followed, and simultaneously the beard, mustache and eyebrows disappeared from the gentleman's face, together with a considerable amount of exposed cuticle. If Providence had not afforded the eyes a better protection than sinful mortals deserve, the unfortunate smoker would have lost his sight also.

ROBBERY BY RULE.

A Systematic Course of Stealing from the Treasury Contingent Fund—School Books and Story Papers for Officials' Children Paid for Out of Government Money.

[Washington Telegram to Chicago Times.]

Senator Cockrell, the Democratic member of the Senate sub-committee engaged in the investigation of the treasury, remains in this city during the holiday week, examining vouchers furnished him from the department, covering disputed items in the expenditure of the contingent fund. He will make a report to the sub-committee when it meets next Tuesday. He is also engaged in scanning the reports of the expenditures of this fund for several years back. To arrive at all the petty thefts practiced upon this fund requires careful study. A system of concealment has been practiced. For instance, in one year six or eight fine carriage robes were purchased for the private use of certain bureau officials. These were charged up under the head of horses and carriages. These robes were of the first quality, and, according to the testimony of an expert, should have lasted fifteen or twenty years; yet the very next year a larger number of equally fine carriage robes was purchased. In the second case the robes were charged up under the head of miscellaneous. In the examination of another set of accounts the committee found numerous items of books. They could not find what books were meant until they took the vouchers and traced them back to the stores where they were purchased. It was then found that it was a pleasant custom of certain treasury officials to have school-books included in the general purchase of the department for the use of their children. One penurious thief had paid for a child's magazine, St. Nicholas, out of the treasury fund, and had had it charged up in the item of books. Indeed, it has been found to be the general practice that nearly every large purchase by the Treasury Department carried with it some item for the private use of the official or his family making the purchase. Items of expenditure for gas traced back through telltale vouchers reveal the interesting fact that the private gas bills of treasury officials have been paid out of the treasury. It will be proved before the close of this examination that practically all of the expenses of Mr. John Sherman in his canvass for the nomination at Chicago have been paid by the Treasury Department. In order to get at all of this, however, it will be necessary to widen the scope of the investigation so as to include all of the private pay-rolls in the department. The two rolls that will afford the most fruitful returns on examination are what are known as the fraud and lapsed rolls. None of the names of the people employed on these rolls appear in the official list of treasury appointments. The incidental expenses of Mr. Sherman's canvass appear throughout the items of the contingent fund, but it is in the expenditures of the rolls above named that the largest sums will be found. When Mr. Sherman went home to Ohio "to mend his fence," he took with him Mr. Babcock, his private secretary. They were gone three days; the audited items of the contingent fund show that Mr. Babcock was allowed a bill of $87 as expenses of his three days' trip. When it is considered that Mr. Babcock visited a small country town, and that he traveled upon a railroad pass going and coming, the bill is quite large enough to pay much more than the ligitimate expenses of himself and the then secretary. The number of incidental trips charged to the contingent fund, where favorites of the ring have gone about the country for mere pleasure, is very large. Something of the strength of the favorites in the treasury is also shown in the grip that Judge French, the Second Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, has upon the public purse. He has every one of his able-bodied relatives upon the pay-roll of the Government. Three sons and several nephews and nieces aggregate salaries amounting to $17,500 per annum; yet there is a rule in the Treasury Department that no two members of the same family shall be employed in that building. It is now probable that the Senate investigation will take a wide range, unless Senator Sherman can influence his Republican associates to shut down upon the new evidence that is coming forward nearly every day, begging to be heard.

[Washington Telegram to Chicago Times.]

Very significant testimony was brought out in the Senate Treasury Investigating Committee. Judge Vail, of the Sherman hand-bill known as the Washington World, was upon the witness-stand for some time. It was stated before the committee that Vail was upon the rolls of the treasury at a salary of $5,000 a year, and that he was still upon the pay-rolls, drawing money for some political service rendered to John Sherman as editor of the paper above named. Judge Vail was asked first if he had been in the employ of the treasury at the time of the publication of the World. Judge Vail replied that he was well known as a special agent of customs for the Georgetown district. This reply made the members of the committee laugh. The office of Collector of Customs at Georgetown, in this district, is in itself a practical sinecure. The idea of having a special agent attached to it besides was about all the proof that was necessary of the original charge. Judge Vail told the committee that he held this office until the time of the appearance of the World, and then he resigned. He said he drew no pay from the treasury while he was editing this paper. After the campaign was closed, and the paper suspended, Judge Vail was again appointed as a special agent of customs. He now belongs to the Oswego, N. Y., district, although the resides in this city, and it is a question whether he was ever in Oswego in his life. His salary is $5,000 a year. He also has a nephew and a son in London. The further interesting fact was developed that the type and printing materials for the Washington World were furnished from the Government printing office. Judge Vail took great pains to say, however, that he paid for this type and printing material upon the 1st of January, 1880. The time of the payment was shortly after a certain publication, looking toward an investigation of Sherman's management of his campaign; but, granting Judge Vail's statement to be exactly true, there yet remains the act that the type and the printing material was furnished to him from the Government printing office and credit given for the same for nearly a year. Judge Vail was not asked where the press-work was done. It is probable that he will be recalled for cross-examination on this subject. It has been charged that the press-work of this paper was done in the printing office in the treasury. At any rate, the Government furnished all the material for the paper and paid the salary of its editor, and, so far as heard from, bore the entire burden of the publication. As far as the investigation has gone, it shows that every item of expense in Mr. Sherman's canvass was charged up to the Government.

The committee examined the contractor who furnished carriages for the department. Several of the wagons made by him were afterward transformed into sleighs, and from sleighs were altered into carriages. A certain bureau official who, under a doubtful construction of the law, is allowed a wagon for official business, had an additional sleigh furnished him for his private use, and had it charged up in the one item of the wagon allowed him. Mr. Paul Brown, the carpenter who worked quite a number of days upon Mr. Sherman's new house, and who was paid for it as a laborer of the Treasury Department, was aslo before the committee, and testified to the facts which have heretofore been stated. There was nothing, however, of a special or sensational character evolved, and there will not be until the resolution authorizing the investigation is amended so as to take in something more than the contingent fund.

[From the Cincinnati Commercial.]

The same lot of persons—the same newspapers—that were abusing Garfield up to the day he was assassinated, the star-routers whose effort was to stain Garfield with their own dirt—are now abusing Blaine. They are determined to associate the ex-Secretary of State in every way with the murdered President.

[From the New York Evening Post.]

If, as is thought by some of President Arthur's friends as well as some of his opponents, it is his purpose to turn the old third-term or stalwart faction, which now forms only a small minority of the party, into a majority, or to subjugate the majority to it by giving it all the offices, it requires no gift of prophecy to predict that he will wretchedly fail in his purpose and wreck his administration upon that very point.

[From the New York Tribune.]

When Gen. Garfield took the oath of office as President, he seemed to those who knew him best, though in his 50th year, still in the prime of a splendid and vigorous youth. He was still growing. We hoped for him eight years of brilliant administration, and then in some form or place of service an old age like that of Adams, whom in variety of equipment alone of our Presidents be resembled. What was best and purest and loftiest in the aspiration of America seemed at last to have laid its hand on the helm. Under its beneficent rule we hoped, as our country entered on its career of peace and prosperity, a nobler liberty, a better friendship, a purer justice, a more lasting brotherhood.

[From the Boston Journal.]

There are tens of thousands of men in this country who believe in the exalted, progressive Republicanism devoted to the interests of the people to which the "Rock of Ohio" devoted his life, in contradistinction to that Republicanism which is satisfied with the victories of the past, and in the present is engrossed in a scramble for the spoils of office and in securing local appropriations. Those tens of thousands—fast increasing—have the right to call themselves Garfield Republicans.

[From the Denver Tribune.]

President Arthur has insulted the memory of Garfield by appointing as his Secretary of the Treasury a man whom Garfield positively refused to put in the Cabinet. He insulted his memory again when he appointed Howe, who had said that Garfield's nomination was a blunder which amounted to a crime. He insulted his memory again when he declined to recognize any of the men connected with the elected President, and took in their place the men who are part of the faction to which the accidental President belongs. His course, taking it from the beginning, has been an utter and a great mistake. It seems to be his intention to recognize only the minority faction in the Republican party. This is neither a wise course nor one to be commended. It is not a course which will win.

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

An office-begging newspaper has invented this happy anecdote concerning the Acting President:

"When a Congressman goes to Acting-President Arthur to ask for the appointment of a Postmaster, or similar official in the smaller towns, the Acting President says: 'I want you to suggest the name of some young, active, progressive Republican. I want to encourage the young men.'"

It was this desire of the Acting President "to encourage the young men," no doubt, which induced him to choose for his Cabinet advisers four ancient politicians who will never see the sunny side of 65 again. Howe is a youth of budding promise. Frelinghuysen is a dashing young blade. Folger and Brewster are sprigs of the law. Edwin D. Morgan, who was invited to be Secretary of the Treasury and declined, was another youthful person. The next call will unquestionably be directed to Peter Cooper or Sojourner Truth.

WHILE Lewis Green, a farmer living in Grant county, was digging a ditch on his farm he unearthed portions of a mastodon's skeleton. Seven years ago Green's brother, while digging in the same place, found several teeth weighing over four pounds each. Green says that he now proposes to search for the rest of the bones. This discovery is the third one of the kind made in the vicinity during the past three years.

Campbell, of Indianapolis, on "Woman's Work in Indiana." The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Mary E. Haggart; First Vice President, Mrs. Dr. Annie B. The Financial Committee report the estimated receipts for the year ending Oct. 31, 1882, to be $35,866.58, including the cash balance of $1,416.58 and the State appropriation of $25,000. The Committee recommends the appropriation of $22,850 for the purch se of books and periodicals for the library, and other sums, aggregating in all $33,165, for the total expenses of the university for the current year.

THE Statistical Bureau of Indiana has completed a table showing the different vocations of women, and the number engaged therein, as returned by the various Township Trustees of the State. Women are engaged in fifty-two vocations, among which are the following: Apiarists, 37; authoresses and newspaper correspondents, 66; bar-tenders, as an occupation, 52; boarding-house proprietors, 533; book agents, as an occupation, 107; farmers, 2,252; clerks, as an occupation, 522; physicians, 98; printers as a trade, 51; preachers, 126; bookbinders, 57; basket makers, 10, and many other professions where women have not heretofore been known professionally.

A MEETING of the State Wool Growers' Association was held at Indianapolis, Fielding Beeler, President, in the chair, and J. W. Robe, Secretary. Papers were presented by C. Dawell, on "Sheep—How to Increase the Number and Quality in Indiana;" by the Hon. Robert Mitchell, on "How We Shall Supply the Looms of the United States With All the Wool They Manufacture," and by W. W. Sunman, on "Sugar Beets, Wurtzels, Rutabagas, Carrots and Parsnips in Relation to Sheep Husbandry." The following officers of the association were elected: President, Fielding Beeler, Indianapolis; Vice President, R. J. Farquhar, Trenton; Secretary, J. W. Robe, Green Castle; Treasurer, S. W. Dungan, Franklin.

A NUMBER of gentlemen met at the State capital for the purpose of forming a State association for the protection and propagation of food fish in the streams of Indiana. A State organization was formed by the election of Samuel E. Williams, of Laporte county, President, and Alexander C. Jameson, of Indianapolis, Secretary and Treasurer, and the selection of the following Executive Committee: J. D. Thurston, Seymour; John M. Stevens, Greensburg; George W. Grubbs, Martinsville; W. B. Engard, Cambridge City; Ignatius Brown, Indianapolis; Joseph Gilbert, Terre Haute; E. H. Waldron, Lafayette; George H. Forgy, Logansport; Col. Josiah Farrar, Peru; Col. Spencer, Fort Wayne, and Dr. Mulholland, Goshen. The association will be known as the Indiana Association for the Protection and Culture of Fish and Game, and a thorough organization of the State will be effected at once.

THE tables of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction showing the apportionment of the common-school revenue for tuition makes this interesting showing: Number of school children in the State, 714,343; amount derived from school tax, $607,611.14; interest collected on common school fund since last apportionment, $93,122.48. The amount derived from other sources, with the above, gives a total collection from the counties of $717,949.56. The balance in the treasury, ready for distribution, is $149,396.08, which, added to the county collections, makes an aggregate sum of $867,345.64 ready for apportionment. The State Normal School gets a semi-annual allowance of $7,500. Marion county reports the largest number of school children, 38,164, and Starke county the smallest number, 1,889. Ohio county has 1,986. The increase of school children over 1880 is 10,785 in the State, and the amount per capita for each enumerated child is $1.20.

THE Delegate Board of Agriculture, made up of about seventy-five Presidents of District Boards and the members of the State Board, met at Indianapolis. President R. M. Lockhart delivered his annual address, in which he said that by the assistance of the Governor and the favor of the Legislature an act had been passed, by which the board was enabled to refund the loan on its ground and buildings for five years, with the privilege of ten, at a much lower rate of interest. The board had paid off five of the original bonds out of the money earned by the fair. Instead of a bonded debt of $60,000, bearing 8 per cent. interest, as one year ago, there is now $55,000, bearing 6 per cent. interest, making a saving of $1,500 annually on the interest account. He recommended a redistricting of the State for agricultural purposes, as the present law was totally inadequate to secure justice and equality. Alexander Heron, Secretary of the Board, submitted his annual report. It shows the total receipts for the year to have been $44,059.45, and expenditures of $24,061.43 in cash orders, and in premiums $6,885.50, leaving a balance of $13,142.52 in the treasury. The net surplus realized from the State fair was $2,212.85. The figures show an increase of $1,278 over the receipts of the State fair in 1880. The Secretary stated that the results of the fair were especially encouraging in view of the unusual discouragements at the time, among them the drought, the assassination of the President, and counter attractions. The other reports showed a very encouraging state of affairs. Prof. Stevenson, of Putnam county, read a paper on "Indiana's Inducements to Immigrants," and Prof. Campbell, of Wabash College, on "The Geodetic Survey of Indiana." Gov. Porter delivered an address. The week of Sept. 25 was chosen as the time for holding the State Fair. The following officers were elected: President, Henry C. Meredith, Cambridge City; Vice President, L. B. Custer, Logansport; Secretary, Alexander Herron, Indianapolis; General Superintendent, Fielding Beeler, Indianapolis; Executive Committee, Robert Mitchell, John P. Barnes, J. K. O'Neil and W. B. Seward.

A SIGN painter carried a bill to a lawyer for payment. The lawyer, after examining it, said: "Do you expect any painters will go to heaven, if they make such charges as these?" "I never heard of but one that went," said the painter, "and he behaved so bad that they determined to turn him out, but, there being no lawyer present to draw up a writ of ejectment, he remained."

A recently elected deputy, who hasn't had much cause to be grateful to the press from the biographic point of view, exclaims, "Yes, the press! It is responsible for a great deal of evil, especially certain penny papers which are spread abroad among the masses, and fall into the hands of thousands of people who do not know how to read or write."

FOR NERVOUS DEBILITY

BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Glands, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoroughly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC R'Y

Is The Great Connecting Link between the East and the West!

Its main line runs from Chicago to Council Bluffs, passing through Joliet, Ottawa, La Salle, Geneseo, Moline, Rock Island, Davenport, West Liberty, Iowa City, Marengo, Brooklyn, Grinnell, Des Moines (the capital of Iowa), Stuart, Atlantic, and Avoca; with branches from Bureau Junction to Peoria; Wilton Junction to Muscatine, Washington, Fairfield, Eldon, Belknap, Centreville, Princeton, Trenton, Gallatin, Cameron, Leavenworth, Atchison, and Kansas City; Washington to Sigourney, Oskaloosa, and Knoxville; Keokuk to Farmington, Bonaparte, Bentonsport, Independent, Eldon, Ottumwa, Eddyville, Oskaloosa, Pella, Monroe, and Des Moines; Mt. Zion to Keosauqua; Newton to Monroe; Des Moines to Indianola and Winterset; Atlantic to Griswold and Audubon; and Avoca to Harlan and Carson. This is positively the only Railroad, which owns, and operates a through line from Chicago into the State of Kansas.

Through Express Passenger Trains, with Pullman Palace Cars attached, are run each way daily between CHICAGO and PEORIA, KANSAS CITY, COUNCIL BLUFFS, LEAVENWORTH and ATCHISON. Through cars are also run between Milwaukee and Kansas City, via the "Milwaukee and Rock Island Short Line."

What will please you most will be the pleasure of enjoying your meals, while passing over the beautiful prairies of Illinois and Iowa, in one of our magnificent Dining Cars that accompany all Through Express Trains. You get an entire meal, as good as is served in any first-class hotel, for seventy-five cents.

Appreciating the fact that a majority of the people prefer separate apartments for different purposes (and the immense passenger business of this line warranting it), we are pleased to announce that this Company runs Pullman Palace Sleeping Cars for sleeping purposes, and Palace Dining Cars for eating purposes only. One other great feature of our Palace Cars is a SMOKING SALOON where you can enjoy your "Havana" at all hours of the day.

Magnificent Iron Bridges span the Mississippi and Missouri rivers at all points crossed by this line, and transfers are avoided at Council Bluffs, Kansas City, Leavenworth and Atchison, connections being made in Union Depots.

Lafayette at Yorktown.

"In the great struggle at Yorktown in the early part of October, 1781, the British were left masters of no external works except two large redoubts; these Washington determined to take. Lafayette, at the head of the American Light Infantry, was ordered to attack the redoubt on the left of the besieged troops. He thought nothing but a bold and rapid onset would enable young soldiers like his to carry intrenchments defended by disciplined troops. He ordered the whole of his division at the word of command to fire, and formed his men in solid column. He then headed them himself charged sword in hand through the mound, in the face of the enemy's fire, forced his way into the redoubt, and in a few minutes carried it with the loss of only a handful of men. After a five days' contest, in which it is said Washington fired the first gun himself, Cornwallis on the 17th of October demanded a parley, and on the 19th surrended his army, and in presence of Generals Rochambeau and Lafayette his sword was delivered to Washington. It is a singular coincidence that in 1824, forty-three years after this battle, Lafayette came to Yorktown, and stopped at the very house then occupied by Cornwallis, and the rooms were lighted by a remnant of the wax candles once used by him."

The Hell of the Hindoos.

The Hindoo idea of hell is different from those set forth in the confessions of faith and creeds of most of the denominations of christianity. Punishments for the most part are in the way of transformations into unpleasant creatures. Those who have been drunkards on earth are in the next world changed into frogs. This ought to be regarded as an improvement rather than a punishment, for a frog is a cold-water animal of commendable habits, and never goes staggering around with a red nose or bloated face. Dissenters from the true faith are turned into snakes. Backbiters are changed to tortoises, and misers to cranes, which seems infelicitous, as the crane is one of the few creatures that can conveniently bite its own back, and the tortoise, with its ability for shutting up, would serve as fit emblem of the miser's strong box. Flesh-eaters are to be eagles; thieves are to be deprived of the power of hearing, and debtors are to be bullocks. The last transmogrification probably has reference to the way in which poor debtors are sometimes slaughtered by their creditors in the present life. The Hindoo hell does not include the notions of brimstone and continuous combustion.

A Cheap Book Binding.

Pack the papers smoothly; hold firmly, and drive a thin chisel through the pile about half an inch from the back. Push strong tape through and leave out about two inches; put three or four tapes through at even intervals. Cut common thick paper boards large enough to project a little everywhere except that one edge must come front of the tapes. Draw the tapes tightly and glue down to the board outside. Skive a piece of leather—common sheepskin will answer—wide enough to cover the back and come on the boards an inch or two, and long enough to project a couple of inches at the end. Paste the leather well, put on the back; fold the ends in so as to come over the boards on each side. Paste any fancy or plain paper over the sides; and, lastly, paste the blank leaf down to the cover inside, and you have a presentable book and very durable. Trimming the edges can be done by clamping between boards, and cutting the edges with a thin sharp knife by a straightedge. Of course this is done before the boards are put on after the tapes are in. This makes a flat edge book, but for a thin book answers very well."

The Eccentric Squirt.

An up-town lad, whose pants were hanging by one button and whose nose had evidently recently been used to plow corn, decided to drain out the nozzle of a hose that was placidly coiled up in front of a store on Second street. He had just wrapped his features around the nozzle, and closed his eyes to take a long, invigorating pull at the dripping fountain, when a clerk inside who had been watching the thing a little, turned on the full pressure of one hundred and ten feet to the square inch.

There was a smothered gurgle and the sound of hissing waters for a moment, then all was still. The clerk came out with the door mat and wiped the water from the calm features of the boy as he lay there, then turned him over and opened his mouth so that the water could run out of him, tenderly spanked him with a pine board to restore animation, and sent him home.

We never bet except on a dead sure thing, but we are ready to lay a wager that the same lad will hereafter submit to the irksome customs of our modern civilization and drink out of a tin cup.

A Fatal Recommendation.

The Deadwood maiden is sometimes vivacious, never sentimental, and always frank. The shades of night were falling fast as she moved a little closer to him, and playfully toying with the lobe of his left ear, said: "I've a favor to ask of you, Ferdinand." "Any thing that I can do for you, Clara, darling, you know I'd be only too happy to undertake." She changed to the lobe of the right ear, and went on: "Well, then, I want you to leave off whiskey strai h for awhile, and try rock and rye." His looks expressed his astonishment as he uttered only the single monosyllable, "Why?" "Because," she answered, continuing her caresses. "Charlie Benton drinks nothing but rock and rye, and his moustache tastes so much sweeter than yours does." Three months later Ferdinand entered the holy state of matrimony, but Clara still pines upon the stem.

Shan't I Take a Blue Pill?

No, don't take it and run the risk of mercural poisons, but when billous and constipated get a package of the celebrated Kidney-Wort, and it will speedily cure you. It is nature's great remedy for constipation, and for all kidney and liver diseases. It acts promptly on these great organs and so restores health, strength and vigor. It is put up in liquid and dry form, both acting with equal efficiency. Price $1. See adv.

—A Frenchman has leased a large tract of waste country in the south of Algeria, and proposes turning it into a lion and panther preserve. Old horses, mules and asses that have seen the end of their usefulness will be purchased and sent thither, and these will act as bait to lure into the preserve, the wild animals of the surrounding country. Those who wish to indulge in lion and panther hunting, not to speak of such small game as lynxes, jackals and tiger cats, will be supplied with the necessary outfit. Those who are bold can shoot at their game from the open, but for the nervous ambuscades will be provided, from which shooting can be done without the least danger of a counter attack. There will be on the estate a comfortable hotel, with a Parisian cook.

—From the Goshen Times we learn: "Mr. P. F. Nye's bedroom was entered by a sneak theif on last Thursday night who carried Mr. Nye's pants to the corn house close by, took some seventy dollars from his pocket book, and then made tracks in the direction of Goshen. Phil censures his wife for not taking better care of his breeches, and thinks that he will hereafter keep an eye on them himself when he goes to sleep! Mr. Nye, who is a liberal-minded man, expresses himself under obligations to the thief for leaving the pocket-knife unmolested, and invites him to come back and go through the same exploit a second time; and he wants us to caution other farmers to lock their doors."

He Had Done 'em Often.

Over in Jersey last week, the manager of a combination was applied to by a lanky-legged chap for an engagement. The fellow, who looked lugubrious enough to have been the shadow of a badly acted Hamlet, stumbled across the stage, and, unjointing himself, collapsed into a chair.

"Well, sir, what's your line of business?" queried the manager.

"Not particular—anything that pays."

"Ever been on the stage?"

"Often!" remarked the aspirant, throwing a quid of dog-leg at the head of the big fiddle, and his left leg over his right knee at one and the same time.

"Yes, sir-ree—I've done all the landlords in Camden."

And yet the aspirant wasn't engaged.

Fort Wayne and Jackson Railroad Company's Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Fort Wayne & Jackson railroad company, for the election of directors for the ensuing year, and the transaction of such other business as may be brought before it, will be held on Saturday January 28, 1882, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the general office of the company, in Jackson, Mich. The transfer books will close January 10, and remain closed until Jan. 30.

—Spanish history says that a ship sent to South America in 1800 to collect tribute from the colonies of Spain was sunk near the mouth of the Rio de la Plata, with $9,000,000 aboard. The money is supposed to lie to-day at the bottom of the ocean, in a strong iron safe. An expedition has just sailed from Philadelphia to recover this treasure. The leader is Captain Charles A Jones, who has already made a fortune in the South American wrecking business. He goes in an iron Steamship, supplied with apparatus for removing the deep mud supposed to cover the dollars.

Holloway' Pills.

Never despair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispels doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Our Mother.

[Written on the death of Mrs. Isaac Hornberger, of Concord township.]

Dear mother, thou art now at rest,
No sorrows cloud thy brow.
We know that thou art with the blest,
No pain can reach thee now.

But oh, we miss thy tender care,
Tears will unbidden start,
Though t'was the Lord who called thee there
'Tis hard, 'tis hard to part.

We yet can see thy pleasant face,
On earth there is no other
Can ever fill the vacant place
Of our dear, angel mother.

Thy fond, thy loving smile we miss.
Thy voice we'll hear no more,
Until we gain that world of bliss
On Canaan's happy shore.

Then rest, dear mother, sweetly rest,
Till God shall bid the rise,
And with the saints forever blest.
We'll meet thee in the skies.

Help us, oh Lord, to bear our woe,
Our hearts with sorrow swell,
But, oh, 'tis sweet relief to know
That Thou doest all things well.

Barbara Fritchie's True Story.

It was to her own troops that Barbara waved the flag, inspiring them on a march that involved some of the most intense sufferings of the war. The days were oppressive, the roads sunny and full of dust, and any moment might bring the contending forces face to face. It was the day before the South Mountain battle. South Mountain lies twelve miles west of Frederick, and to this point General Reno, under Burnside, was pressing when he passed Dame Barbara's door.

"They were passing all day," Mrs. H. went on to stay, "but in the morning I said to my daughter, Julia, there are so many soldiers around, go across the bridge; and bring Aunt over; she is alone and may feel afraid."

"And did you bring her back?" said I.

"Oh, no" laughed Julia, Aunt Fritchie was standing at the window, nodding and smiling to the troops, who were gathered all about her, and when I came she said, 'Child hand me my flag; you'll find it in my bible.'"

In between the pages that Barbara read daily the "silken scarf" was folded, a little flag of twisted silk, not two feet long. It was not on a staff, so Barbara waved it like a handkerchief. The throng increased, the men would not move on, but breaking ranks, were crowding around her with, "Why mother, how are you?" "Hurrah for 76!" "Let's shake hands, grandmother," etc. At this moment General Reno came up at the head of his brigade; the picture met his eye; the crowded artillery, the banners, horses, swords, muskets and men and in the midst, the veritable "old gray head," with its smooth, white cap, the folded muslin over the breast, now beating with young heart throbs, the bent figure in the black gown. He reined his horse before her. "And how old is grandmother?" he said. Some one replied, "Ninety-Six." "Ninety-Six!" Halt! Three cheers for the loyal old grandmother! A shout went up that had some sound in it; the general dismounted, entered the little house with one of his aids, shook hands with Barbara, was seated, and in few minutes the old lady was pouring him out a glass of wine of her own making. Good-bye was spoken and the troops passed on; but nearly all that day the aged figure could be seen cheering the passing soldiers by her enthusiasm. The next day came the word, "A flower on the union side has fallen." The brave Reno, respected by both sides alike, was killed at South Mountain, in an engagement whose details of fierce contest will never be fully known.

"The next day," Mrs. H——continued, "we were over at aunt's and went into the garden to attend to the flowers, charging her not to open the door if any one rapped while we were down there, for the town was full of strangers. When we returned to the parlor, she met us quivering with excitement. 'I couldn't help it, he would have it. I didn't want to give it, but he was a gentleman,' said she, 'he had things on his shoulders and wore a gold watch and chain. It was hard to draw from the old lady that she had responded at once to the tap upon the door. Then an officer entered and pleaded so persistently for the little cotton flag she had then about her, that the old woman gave way. 'He would have it, but it wasn't the one,' she said appealingly."

In passing to and from her house to her niece's Barbara would often find her steps thronged by soldiers, for a clear spring bubbled up just opposite her house, by the creek, refreshing many, both of the blue and the gray; if it chanced to be her "own soldiers" her tumblers and dipper were freely given, but if it happened that an array of gray uniforms were there, her staff would stir in among them as though they were dead leaves, and they would scatter in every direction, amused at the way she addressed them in language not at all disguised by superfluous rhetorical finish.

How Agates are Cut.

[Ward's Natural Science Bulletin.]

The variety of quartz known as Agate, is a variegated chalcedony, with the color distributed in clouds, spots or concentric layers. The variety called Moss Agate occurs in veins, while the banded agate is found in the form of geodes or balls, and occasionally there will be found in the side of these balls a sort of funnel through which was introduced the silicious matter forming the layers.

Judging from the number of these agates to be seen, one might be led into the error of supposing that they could be found almost anywhere along our shores, and as the prices at which they are sold are very low, it is evident that the cutting and polishing must be done in some country where labor is cheaper than here. However, the explanation is given when we are told that they are German Agates, for, although for a number of years comparatively few agates suitable for cutting have been found on German soil, yet we may safely say that, at the present time, nine-tenths of all the commercial agates are cut and polished at the mills of Oberstein The chief source of agates now is South America, where, especially in Brazil, they occur in great numbers. They are shipped thence as ballast in vessels bound for Hamburg, and from this port are forwarded by rail to Oberstein, where they are sorted into lots, usually in the yard of some well known inn, and sold at auction. When purchased, they are sent to the agate mills, where they are cut and polished on wheels turned by water power, though of late years steam has been introduced in a few mills.

Along the Idar river, between the towns of Idar and Oberstein, there were, in 1867, one hundred and fifty-three mills, working seven hundred and twenty-four stones. Each mill contains from three to five stones, set on a horizontal axle, one end running outside the workshop and communicating with the water-weel. The mill-stones are usually red sandstones, about five feet in diameter, and rotate in a vertical plane, the broad edge of the wheel being kept moist by a stream of water trickling down upon it from above. The choice agates are usually cut into shape with steel wheels and diamond powder. The common ones, however, are not sawn, but roughly dressed with hammer and chisel, the workmen acquiring, by long experience, dexterity in applying their blows so as to attain the desired fracture.

The grinding is done on the broad edge of the wheel, which is furrowed with channels corresponding in shape with the form which is desired to give the object in hand. The agate is usually attached to a small stick, and thus applied to the moving wheel.

Each stone accommodates two men, but these men, instead of sitting at the wheel, are stretched in an almost horizontal position upon a wooden stool made to fit the body. The limbs are thus left free, the hands holding the agate to the wheel, while the feet are strongly pressed against blocks of wood fastened to the floor. After being ground, the agates are polished on cylinders of hard wood, or on lead or zinc discs, fed with a mixture of Tripoli and water.

Many of the agates, beautiful as they are in nature, are artificially colored in the following manner: Having been well washed, they are placed in a syrup of honey and water, sometimes in olive oil; after this, they are exposed for some time to moderate heat in a vessel embedded in hot ashes, care being taken that the liquid does not boil. When removed, they are washed, placed in sulphuric acid, and exposed to gentle heat. After they have taken color, they are again washed, and it is often the practice finally to lay them in a bath of oil, which improves the lustre. Some layers of agate are quite porous, while others are dense and well nigh impervious. When steeped in oil, only the porous layers absorb the liquid, which, being deoxidized and blackened by the acid, makes the contrast between the layers more striking, thus enhancing greatly the beauty and value of the agate. Other colors are given agates by various processes; some, such as the reds, by simple exposure to heat; others by immersion in certain solutions, but these methods vary with the different lapidaries, and are more or less trade secrets.

Our Proposed New Navy.

The Naval Advisory Board on reorganizing the navy, in their report to the Secretary of the Navy says:

We have only 31 ships of war which are either now efficient or worth repairing. In regard to the need of new ships the board takes the position that in order to put the navy upon a proper footing it is necessary to build at once 41 ships of various classes, as follows: 2 vessels of 5,300 tons displacement, which shall be able to steam 15 knots at sea; 6 vessels of 4,200 tons displacement, able to steam 14 knots; 13 vessels of 3,000 tons displacement, capable of 13 knots, and 20 gunboats, capable of making 10 knots, each of 770 tons. The material recommended for the gunboats is wood; for all the rest the board decides upon steel shells covered with wood and sheathed with copper. The idea is to have a navy of swift iron cruisers, it being thought best to defer for the present the building of ironclads. The construction of this latter class has been so rapidly changing of late that a decision may well be delayed until the navy is provided with ships of a class more needed for ordinary service. All of the ships the construction of which the board recommends, are of a little heavier tonnage and are stronger than the corresponding class of vessels in any other navy. Their rate is also a little faster, and they will all carry guns somewhat heavier than those now used on ships of corresponding grades in the best foreign navies. These ships are all to be fitted for full sailing power, and all are to carry six days' coal for full steaming. It is estimated by the board that the time of constructing this new navy, including the repair and refitting of such as are worth it of those now on hand, will be eight years. The cost is estimated at $31,000,000, and the navy would then consist of sixty-two vessels of all classes.

A minority report was submitted in regard to the six 14-knot vessels, recommending that they be constructed with one deck or without a spar deck.

Sinlaging.

Writes a correspondent: "The next competition was between women, and is called 'sinlaging.' Strings are thrown across the street from window to window, about eleven feet from the ground. From the center of each is suspended a potato, tied in a handkerchief, which the women, blindfolded, are to try and strike. The sport caused a great sensation. The street, one occupied by the poor and humble but respectable and hard-working people, was filled some time before the fun began. Two young stalwart men, with broad, round faces, emerged from a small doorway, holding aloft the prizes to be competed for. They were in pairs, the two highest being cheaply-silvered vases, the second being the same in blue china. The young men, holding one in each hand, danced and sang some Flemish song; then they entered a house where the string was and set the prizes in the window. This proceeding was repeated, there being two other pairs of prizes. The old women tried first. Each stood about ten steps off from the suspended potato, facing it. She was honestly blindfolded, then given a huge wooden ladle, with which she was to try and strike the potato. The first old lady struck in the air before she was more than half way. Two or three others, profiting by her failure, came nearer, but hit far aside, generally bringing down the ladle in such close proximity to some man's head as to excite shouts of laughter. The younger women, when their turn came, seemed strangely unable to follow their noses, and were apt to turn and rush suddenly into the crowd. One began to lay about her as if she had forgotten that the potato was on high, and caused much scampering and dodging. After a great many failures a success was gained, but it took some hours before all the prizes were won."

His Last Dose.

Said a sufferer from kidney troubles, when asked to try Kidney-Wort. "I'll try it but it will be my last dose." The man got well, and is now recommending the remedy to all. When derangement of the stomach acts upon the kidneys and liver bringing disease and pain, Kidney-Wort is the true remedy. It removes the cause and cures the disease. Liquid (very concentrated) or dry act equally efficiently.—[Am. Cultivator.

—Dr. A. W. Brinkerhoff, whose advertisement appears in another column, is now devoting all his time to the cure of piles and similar diseases. He will be at the Swineford House November 16, December 14, and January 11. Those who wish, can consult him on those days. 49-1f.

A Washington dispatch says that "J. A. Emerson, formerly a clerk in the Third Auditor's office, was examined by the Treasury investigating committee. He is from Arkansas, and swore that ex-Secretary Sherman, in the spring of 1880, gave him a roving commission, ostensibly to visit the offices of Collectors of Internal Revenue and other Treasury officials in Arkansas, and to inspect the operations thereof. The real object of his visit was to work up the Sherman boom. Mr. Emerson says that he had a perfect understanding with Mr. Sherman, having repeatedly conversed with him on the subject at his house in Washington, and the witness produced a number of letters written to him by Mr. Sherman's confidential advisers said to corroborate his statements. Emerson testified that he found all the leading Republicans of Arkansas and the South for Grant, and that he saw it would be impolitic for him to antagonize that sentiment; that, instead of working for Sherman, he gave his support to Grant, and went to the Chicago Convention in Grant's interest; that on the very day of his return from Chicago to Washington he was discharged from a position in the treasury which he had acceptably filled for three years."

The House bill appropriating $540,000 for the census deficiency was passed. The feature of the day was a debate on the resolution for the repeal of the Pension-Arrearages act. Mr. Voorhees declared the measure an honest one; Mr. Beck argued against the scheme at great length, and Mr. Ingalls expressed his willingness to vote $1,000,000,000 to the soldiers. In the House, a bill was introduced by Mr. Cullen, of Illinois, to appropriate $100,000 for the construction of locks and dams so as to insure six feet of water in the channel of the Illinois river at low water, and also for the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan canal to a breadth of not less than 160 feet and a depth of not less than eight feet from Joliet to Chicago. Mr. Plumb argued that the redemption fund for United States notes ought to be diminished, and all bonds redeemed up to the limits of $100,000,000. He advocated currency versus bank circulation. Mr. Teller was opposed to the bill because he disliked this "everlasting tinkering with the finances," and was in favor of silver coinage. Funding bill, Mr. Ingalls moved to lay the measure on the table. THE GUITEAU TRIAL.

FORTY-THIRD DAY.

Mr. Davidge resumed his argument for the prosecution, and spent the day in a matter-of-fact and, at times, rather tedious review of the evidence. Passing lightly over the more unimportant parts, he laid marked emphasis upon the damaging testimony of John W. Guiteau, who, he said, was a most unwilling witness against his brother, but who was obliged, as a man of truth and honor, to affirm the prisoner's sanity and his hateful, domineering, egotistic temper. John Guiteau's testimony, at the time it was rendered, was universally commented upon as very bad for the defense, and the skillful use made of it by Mr. Davidge shows what importance the prosecution attached to it. This witness was from the very first opposed to the plea of hereditary insanity, as it touched himself and his children as nearly as it did the prisoner. Hence he rendered the prosecution very material help in attacking this line of defense. It is understood that he feels very indignant at Mr. Scoville for making this theory so prominent, and that after the trial is concluded he will set himself right before the public on the matter.

Mr. Davidge, while he in no wise encouraged Guiteau's interruptions, noticed them where it served his purpose, and on several occasions made them the text for apropos and telling comment. His description of the prisoner's own testimony was given in graphic sentences. He had been put on the stand, said Mr. Davidge, as a last hope, but, so far from sustaining the defense, he had removed any doubt which remained as to his sanity. He then commented on Guiteau's character as testified to by several of the witnesses for the prosecution, showing that he was a thorough scoundrel, whose insanity consisted in an absurd idea of his own consequence, which led him to disregard all the rights of others which interfered with his own convenience.

"He may be a crank," said the speaker, scornfully, "but he is responsible enough to be hanged."

He proceeded to discuss the medical testimony, taking up the hypothetical question of the defense and claiming that its bases were not sustained by the evidence. He also pointed out that the inquiry begged the question at issue and was artfully incomplete and unfair. Then he turned to the inspiration theory. "If he was inspired," said Mr. Davidge, "it was from the devil—not from God. Substitute devil for God, and the meaning of much of this pressure is clear. Guiteau struggled against it as every man tempted of the devil struggles, but he did not resist. He succumbed, and sin brought forth death."

As the orator drew his speech to a close the prisoner made several of his spiteful demonstrations, and singled out Corkhill for another tirade of abuse, quoting, as he has often quoted before, the action of the mills of the gods. He said that they would, in their grinding, make slow but sure work of Corkhill.

FORTY-FOURTH DAY.

At the opening of court Guiteau stated that he had thirty checks, representing about $15,000, some of which were worthless, and that he wanted no more of the latter kind. When Mr. Scoville asked if the prisoner would be allowed to speak to the jury, the assassin exclaimed that he wouldn't trust his case in the hands of the best lawyer in America. Judge Cox said it was safe to assume that Guiteau would abuse the privilege of arguing in his own defense, for which reason it would not be granted. Mr. Reed then commenced an argument which consumed the day, and was subjected to frequent interruptions by the assassin. There were portions of the speech which seemed to considerably impress the jury—notably the very pathetic passages in which Mr. Reed denounced the crime for its atrocity, and pictured the widow nightly praying that the murderer of her husband might be pronounced insane. Those who closely watched the jury observed that there were tears in the eyes of some. Reed's method was earnest and deliberate. His expression was always serious. He fought to prove that, from the time of his birth, Guiteau was a victim of mental disease. Commencing with the period of his mother's maternity, he showed that all through the weary months she was an invalid, and argued that Guiteau was the sufferer from this. The boy could not talk till he was 6 years old, and was whipped by his father because he could not—whipped from boyhood, Reed argued, because the hand of God was on him. He led a blameless life from that hour; it was maintained, to the age of 19, when he struck his father. That, the counsel claimed, was an act of madness. Then Luther Guiteau, worthy man as he may have have been in all other respects, was insane upon religion, and he forced young Guiteau to enter the Oneida Community, which was the vestibule of hell. From that hour, Reed endeavored to show by Guiteau's letters, which the prosecution had introduced, and by the testimony of the Government witnesses, the prisoner was insane. The circumstances surrounding the shooting he dwelt upon with great emphasis, as indicating this. Reed drew a parallel favorable to Guiteau from the various prominent political assassinations of history, ending with William Lawrence's attack upon Andrew Jackson. He even quoted the case of Charlotte Corday as one of insanity.

Reed quoted Guiteau against himself to prove his insanity, and mildly characterized his outrageous outburst as "to some extent a boisterous manner." When Reed went so far as to predict that Guiteau would become a driveling idiot, the latter from the dock hissed out an indignant "Pish!"

In conclusion, Reed said: "Gentlemen of the jury, you all said, when you were sworn, that you would be governed by the evidence and stand up to it, without regard to the effect it might have upon you and your business. I adjure you to keep that oath. Falter not in the performance of the duty which shall save you and this fair land from eternal disgrace. I assert that the conviction of this man to the gallows, and his execution, would be an infamy beyond description—an indelible stain on American jurisprudence and American juries. Think of the scene if you condemn him to the gallows! Though not present in body to see the sight you cannot but be there in mind. If such a day shall ever come (and I do not believe it ever can come under this evidence) think of this man brought out from his cell with the same pale face and same weary, wandering eyes! The officers of the law gathering round him, pinioning him, binding him with cords so that his muscles stand out, covering him with the black hood, shutting out the light of day from him, and leading him to the scaffold. Think of him—a lunatic—condemned to the gallows—a lunatic whom the Savior, if He were on earth, would heal! The picture is not overdrawn! I am very much obliged to you for your attention. I only ask you, Pray do that which shall not, in after years, bring a blush of shame to your cheeks."

FORTY-FIFTH DAY.

George Scoville began his argument for the defense, and consumed the day without finishing. He started by charging that there was a conspiracy to hang the prisoner. He then proceeded to name the conspirators: The District Attorney, Judge Porter, Mr. Davidge and five of the Government experts, namely, Drs. Gray, Hamilton, Kempster, MacDonald and Wooster. The counts of this indictment, twenty in number, are:

First—They have perverted the law in this case.

Scoville, in illustration or support of this count, alluded to the introduction by Judge Porter of the decision of Judge Davis in a New York case. He said: "Counsel upon the other side indignantly repudiated the suggestion that Judge Davis sat with Cardozo or Barnard, but I have yet to learn if either of them ever committed a more reprehensible act than that of Judge Davis."

Scoville warmed up with his subject, and denounced in severe language the extra-judicial act of Judge Davis. "Had a newspaper been guilty of such a bold-faced attempt to influence the decision in a pending cause, the editor would have been subject to arrest for contempt."

Judge Porter—"Don't let us turn this court-room into a town meeting."

Scoville resumed, but was soon interrupted by Davidge, who, with some impatience, said: "Oh, no, no, Scoville; that's not so."

Scoville—You may interrupt as much as you please; I shall not be deterred from saying just what I believe to be the truth.

Davidge—Well, well, I'll not interrupt again, and say what you may.

Guiteau—That's right, Davidge; you keep quiet. You talked for two days and didn't say anything either; now give some one else a show.

Scoville continued: When Judge Porter comes before this jury and undertakes to pervert evidence, I shall not keep quiet, as I did with Davidge, but I shall stop him.

Guiteau—So shall I.

Scoville—I shall stop him, and I shall correct him, if I find he is misstating evidence.

Guiteau—Never mind; I'll attend to him.

Judge Porter—There will be two Guiteaus then to attend to me.

Scoville continued: "The prosecution states that if the prisoner knew the fact was wrong on July 2, then he should hang. Now this is not by any means the whole of it, or a correct statement of the law. The court has added in substance as follows: 'Yet if in this act he was overpowered by a consciousness coming through his diseased mind that what he was doing was necessary for the good of the country and was specially approved by God, then you cannot convict him of murder.'"

Scoville proceeded to point out to the jury what he termed the perversions of evidence by Davidge. He attacked the theory of the prosecution that it was the prisoner's own innate or acquired depravity that naturally led up to the killing of the President, and discussed at some length the evidence introduced by them to show instances of the prisoner's meanness and depravity. "This evidence," said Scoville, "has in almost every instance been perverted. Counsel parade here the debts owed by the prisoner, and attempt to make much of them in this chain they are weaving."

Guiteau—I owe about $1,000, and I suppose that ought to hang a man. If these people will send in their bills now, I'll give them checks for them, and get them out of the way. I suppose I've got some money now. I'll get rid of these people, and then I won't owe anybody.

Scoville then alluded to the incident sworn to by Shaw of Guiteau pawning a worthless watch for $25.

Guiteau shouted: "Oh, you better stop on Shaw—'pshaw,' I mean." And added: "That was meant for a pun, but they don't seem to see it."

Scoville denounced the witness Shaw. He believed he had deliberately perjured himself in this case, as had also the contemptible little Jew clerk who came down here to help Shaw out.

Guiteau screamed out: "This whole testimony of Shaw is false, and no decent man would believe it for an instant."

FORTY-SIXTH DAY.

Scoville resumed his argument for the defense, and was at once interrupted by Guiteau, who made one of his characteristic speeches, asking the court to instruct that if it appear that he was forced by the Deity to remove the President he may be acquitted on the ground of transitory mania. Sickles, McFarland and Hiscock, he said, were acquitted on the ground of transitory mania.

Scoville began with a general complaint of the alleged unfairness on the part of the prosecution, particularly of the Prosecuting Attorney. He had from the beginning proscribed who should visit the jail and who should not. He had introduced persons into the prisoner's cell under false guise, to worm out his secrets, and when the prisoner said anything which might inure to his benefit the Prosecuting Attorney has been very careful to let it become known. He complained of Corkhill's unfairness in destroying the notes of Stenographer Bailey, so that the defense could not have the benefit of them. The conduct of the prosecution in the court-room, he alleged, was not only unfair to the defense, but was often discourteous and more befitting a police court than this.

Scoville then criticised severely the course of the prosecution in refusing to permit the prisoner to address the jury for a brief hour or two, simply because they feared he might disclose by his manner or speech his true mental condition.

Scoville then called attention to the letter written by Guiteau to the District Attorney, and from which a portion had been clipped, as he claimed, by the prosecution, and in a spirit of unfairness.

Davidge (smiling)—"Oh, just assume that one of the conspirators cut it out."

Corkhill—"I suppose what you are driving at is that you want the jury to think I cut a slip out of that letter."

Scoville—"I believe it was done by you, or by your direction, for the reason that you believed it for the interest of the prosecution."

"So do I," shouted Guiteau.

Scoville then proceeded to give the jury his views upon Judge Porter, and to instruct them as to how much weight they should attach to his utterances, and as to the best means of counteracting the influence of his oratory. Porter, he said, was prostituting his fine attainments in an effort to hang an insane man.

Scoville then reviewed the prisoner's life, and said: "When he left the Oneida Community, he sought out Beecher's church, the Young Men's Christian Association, and the society of Christian people. His tendencies at this time were not immoral, nor had he shown any indication of that awful (with sarcasm) crime of not paying his board-bills, for which this prosecution are trying to hang him."

Corkhill—"Oh, no. If he is hung at all, it will be for murder—not for owing board-bills."

Guiteau called out: "I guess there ain't much chance of my being hung, anyhow."

Scoville continued, up to the hour of adjournment, his review of the life of the prisoner, explaining his acts in the light of counsel's (Scoville's) theory upon the case. Guiteau occasionally commented, but never seriously disturbed the course of the argument.

Scoville spoke of the monumental assurance of the prisoner in naming himself in connection with Grant, Conkling and Arthur.

"I should say a pretty fine quartette," exclaimed the prisoner.

Later on, Scoville read from Guiteau's speech, when Guiteau again called out: "You better not read any more, Scoville; it goes dead against your 'fool' theory."

FORTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Scoville resumed his address, taking up and discussing insane statistics introduced by the prosecution. Discussing the horrors of crime, as often shown in the acts of insane criminals, Scoville said there was nothing in this act to compare with some of these acts of insane criminals; "and, gentlemen of the jury," he said, "in my opinion, if there were not reasons, and powerful ones, at the back of this prosecution, this prisoner never would have been brought to trial. But I tell you, gentlemen of the jury, back of this prosecution is an influence which I have felt, and which you may feel, gentlemen, before this trial is concluded. There are politicians who seek to hide their own shame behind the disgrace of this poor prisoner and make him a scapegoat for their crime. I did not intend, gentlemen of the jury, to take up this feature of the case, but when I find the power and influence of this Government used against me in denying the small pittance that I have asked for a fair and impartial trial, and the small facilities needed for a proper defense, I do not propose to keep quiet. I say that such men as Grant and Conkling and Arthur are morally and intellectually responsible for this crime. Mr. Conkling shall not escape, shall not shirk the responsibility of the state of things that led to this act, and he shall not escape the condemnation of the American people, if I can help it, for his share in this disgraceful scramble for office that led to a conflict with the chosen ruler of this great nation, and led this poor insane man to compass—what they would have hailed with satisfaction, as would, probably, hundreds of other politicians, if it could have occurred other than through assassination—the removal of Garfield, who stood in the way of their unrighteous and disgraceful struggle for office. Neither shall Grant escape that condemnation to which he is so justly subjected, when, coming from Mexico, and coming with undue haste to throw his own name into this petty quarrel about a small office in the Republican party, he sought to foment differences that had sprung up. I am not going to see the misdeeds of those men, high in power, visited upon the head of this poor insane man if I can help it. This clamor for his blood is not for the purpose of avenging Garfield or of satisfying justice. Their theory is that: If it can be shown that this was the act of a sane man, then these politicians in high places will say, 'Of course we are not responsible for the act of a sane man. To be sure, we had some differences, but then it could never have led a sane man to such an act;' but, on the contrary, gentlemen of the jury, what is the effect of your verdict if you acquit him as an insane man? Why, people will say, 'Some one is at fault;' they will say, 'We will fix the blame upon the heads and hearts of those men who waged the war upon our poor dead President until it drove this poor insane man, from reading daily in the papers what Grant says, what Conkling says, and from constantly thinking upon it, to his insane act of killing the President; and there are men in high places, the really culpable ones, who will go down to posterity with the stigma upon their names and the detestation of their countrymen fastened upon their memories.'"

The prisoner, who had been looking over the New York papers, called out: "I see the New York Court of Appeals has just decided in favor of our theory on the insanity question. I thank you, Messrs. Judges."

Scoville discussed the conduct and actions of Guiteau at the time and immediately after the shooting, and contended that they were entirely in keeping with the theory of insanity—that his coolness, his quietly going to bed and peacefully sleeping the night after the murder were characteristic incidents of crime such as would be expected from an insane man, and insane men.

FORTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Guiteau opened proceedings by thanking the New York Court of Appeals for its timely decision on the law of insanity. "Hitherto," said the assassin, "the law has been that the burden of proof was on the defendant, but the Court of Appeals, with grand magnanimity, says that the burden of proof is on this prosecution, to prove that the man not only committed the act, but also that he was sane at the time he committed it." After the prisoner had delivered himself of this little speech, Scoville resumed his argument, reading from the evidence of several witnesses who were at the depot and saw the shooting and subsequent arrest of Guiteau, his object being to show that the prisoner was perfectly calm and cool, and in a condition of nerves and intellect at variance with the hypothesis of sanity under such circumstances.

As Scoville proceeded, Corkhill made frequent and, as the speaker evidently thought, slighting comments, until, finally becoming irritated, he turned to the District Attorney and denounced in scathing terms his unfair conduct, and instanced his presentation as evidence in this case of a letter written by the prisoner, and which he (Corkhill) had intercepted and mutilated by cutting off the signature and such portion as he thought might benefit the prisoner, "a thing," said Scoville, "which was never before permitted in a court of justice, not even upon the trial of a civil suit."

Scoville—"Well, let it be my opinion. I presume I am entitled to one, and so is the jury."

Guiteau (with energy)—"It was a friendly allusion to President Arthur that he cut out—the mean, dirty whelp."

As Scoville continued, counsel for the prosecution frequently interrupted him, and a running fire was kept up between counsel for some time. The speaker disclaimed as his main motive the desire to shield the prisoner for the honor of the Guiteau family. His greatest desire was to save the American people and the American judiciary from the disgrace of hurrying to the gibbet an insane man.

Commenting upon, as he claims, the absence of motive on Guiteau's part, Scoville read: "You cannot find a case in history—you cannot suppose a case where a man 40 years of age, who has never committed crime, who has never for an hour associated with criminals or bad people; who, on the contrary, has always sought the society, not only of the better class of people, but of Christian people; you cannot conceive of such man's committing such a crime without motive. Nothing but the theory of insanity can possibly account for such an act as Guiteau's."

Scoville then discussed the assumption that Guiteau might have been actuated by desire for revenge, and argued the improbability of such assumption, from the fact if any ground for ill will existed on Guiteau's part it was against Secretary Blaine, and according to the inexorable laws of mind it would have been executed against him. There cannot possibly be shown, said Scoville, any ill-will on his part toward President Garfield.

Scoville next took up the hypothesis that the crime was committed from an overpowering desire for notoriety, and claimed history failed to point out a case where such a crime was committed purely and simply from such motive, and that it was incompatible with reason and impossible for the human mind to conceive such motive as sufficient to induce any sane man to commit such crime.

A YANKEE LAD.

When I was a little fellow, in Stuttgart, with yellow hair and wooden shoes, there came one day to the school which I attended an American boy named Jim Saunders, whose father was an American broker. He was a quiet, simple looking child, with great soulful brown eyes, and an innocent look in his face that made us all think he couldn't know much. We used to make fun of his peaked face and thin legs, because in Germany, you know, the children are all round-faced and fat. Little Jimmy never seemed to notice that we were enjoying ourselves at his expense, and this made us think he was too simple for any use. But after he had been in the school about six months, he could speak German pretty well. A circus came to town, and, of course, was the sole topic of conversation among the boys. One day we were discussing the matter, when Saunders, who had been sitting quietly in a corner of the room, said he should think a little boy might crowd in under the circus tent and see the show that way. We all laughed heartily at this exhibition of ignorance, because we all knew how closely the tent was watched, and more than one of us had been made temporarily delirious by having the boss canvassman's boot lean suddenly against the seat of our pants. So when little Jimmy said this, we laughed heartily, and Jacob Laudenheimer, who was the biggest boy in school, said that nobody but a Yankee would talk so foolishly. But Jimmy seemed to think he was right, and finally Jacob offered to bet him two marks that he couldn't get into the circus under the tent. Jimmy always had plenty of money, and he at once took the bet. Then several more of the boys began betting the little fellow until I felt sorry for him, and finally concluded to bet him six groshens myself, so that I could give the money back to him when all the others had won theirs, and do a noble act. Little James took the bet, and after all the money had been put up with Mr. Niersteiner, one of the teachers, the whole crowd went over to the circus ground to see James lose. He went right up to the ticket-wagon and bought a ticket. Then he said to the man: "I reckon there is no objection to my going under the canvass, as long as I have paid my way?" The man said certainly not; if anybody wanted to take that much trouble he had no objection. So Jimmy crawled under the tent and came out of the main entrance in a minute, looking just as solemn and innocent as ever. Of course Mr. Niersteiner had to give him the money, because he had won it fairly, and after he had put it in his pocket he winked at us and said: "If you little tow-headed Dutchmen think I knocked around New York for eight years for nothing, you will get left." This sad incident came near blighting my otherwise happy boyhood.—"Pitfalls of Youth," by Carl Schurz.

AUBURN COURIER.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1882.

EX-SENATOR SARGENT has two daughters, both of whom are practicing physicians.

A YOUNG man named John W. Lotty was admitted to the city hospital at San Antonio, Texas, as a pauper, but when he died funds to the amount of $9,000 were found among his effects.

THE Philadelphia Ledger printed last year the announcements of the death of 839 persons who had reached 80 years of age, 334 of whom were men and 505 women. Two of the men and ten of the women had passed 100 years.

DR. C. B. AGNEW writes from St. Johns, Fla., that there is a universal spirit of enterprise and industrial activity in that State. He says the country is being rapidly settled, and the planting of orange groves, and other vegetables and fruits, is going on with energy and an ardor that is amusing and instructive. The value of the crop is said to be immense, and the returns unquestionably satisfactory.

PRESIDENT ARTHUR is the first American President to cut loose from the fashion of the fathers and shroud himself in a frock coat and gloves at a morning reception. It was doubtless the right thing to do, but it was a departure from the habit which had survived in the White House from the last generation, when full dress was the dress of ceremony at all hours, and precise lawyers and card-table-makers and dignified clergymen never wore anything else.

CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG and her colored maid, and Mr. Pond, her business manager, sat down for dinner at a hotel in Milan, Tenn., recently. The proprietor stepped up and informed the maid that separate tables were reserved for servants. Miss Kellogg at once became very indignant; if the maid was not permitted to sit at the same table, the whole party would leave the dining-room. This argument was a clincher, and the meal was served without further objection on the part of the proprietor.

THIS year the Irish farmers are sending cargoes of potatoes to the western ports of Great Britain. Moreover, a considerable quantity of Irish potatoes is being shipped to the United States. Scotch and German potatoes are also being shipped to the United States. Scotch regents are very scarce in all the wholesale markets of the North, and champions are plentiful; champions are not liable to disease, whereas the best East Lothian regents have suffered considerably from it.

ACCORDING to the latest official information, vaccination is steadily advancing in favor with the people of India. During 1879-80 the operation was performed in Bengal in something like 500,000 more cases than in the previous year. Satisfactory returns were also obtained from the Bombay Presidency and the central provinces of Berar and British Burmah. The Burmese, indeed, are so ready to accept vaccination that it only remains to supply them with a competent staff of honest vaccinators, and to provide a regular supply of good lymph. In this respect they form an agreeable contrast to some of the people of the Punjab, who show considerable opposition, which, however, appears to be due partly to the ignorance and partly to the obstruction and apathy of the local authorities.

ADMIRERS of Judge Davis are becoming plentiful. He is said to rather like his position as presiding officer of the Senate and heir apparent to the Presidency, but not to care anything for style in connection with it. A correspondent of the Boston Transcript tells that ex-Gov. Randolph, of New Jersey, was walking with Davis across the dusty fields of Yorktown, "when they met the Governor of South Carolina, who said that the South Carolina troops were encamped near there, and that he would have them out to salute the Vice President. Gov. Randolph was extremely pleased, and they agreed to have the troops out at once, and to give the distinguished visitor all the honors of war. In fifteen minutes the whole command was under arms, when the question came—where was the Vice President? And behold, in the dim distance was his portly figure, waddling away, with his thumbs in his waistcoat sleeves. Gov. Randolph rushed after him and captured him. 'Why, bless my soul!' said the rotund Judge, 'I forgot all about it.' So, after the troops had been standing ten or fifteen minutes, Gov. Randolph, as red as a beet, marched up the runaway Vice President, puffing like a whale, and the salute was gone through."

A FEW years ago Australia welcomed with many demonstrations of joy the arrival of a few pairs of English sparrows. To-day there is a premium of sixpence per dozen upon the heads of the little creatures, which have multiplied to an amazing extent amid their congenial surroundings, and are a source of great loss to fruit-growers. Before the commission appointed to inquire into the matter one witness said that in the short space of ten days the sparrows ate a ton and a half of grapes. They ravaged the figs off five trees and [illegible] fifteen acres of lucerne during the summer. Another complains that in the season they took £30 worth of fruit; while a third declares that he sowed peas three times and each time they were destroyed by the sparrows. Neither apricots, cherries, figs, apples, grapes, peaches, plums, pears, nectarines, loquats, olives, wheat, barley, oats, cabbages, cauliflowers, nor seeds, nor fruit of any kind are spared by the sparrow's carnivorous bill; and all means of defense tried against its depredations, whether scarecrows, traps, netting, shooting, or poisoning, are declared to be insufficient to cope with the enemy.

SINCE the destruction by fire of the Ring Theater, in Vienna, the municipal authorities of Chicago have been examining into the theaters and public halls of that city, with a view of enforcing such regulations as will prevent a repetition there of the Vienna horror. Nearly all of them were found extremely faulty in construction, and many of them are pronounced veritable fire-traps. Probably the only exception is McVicker's Theater. This house is disconnected, as all theaters should be, with any other building. It fronts on a broad street, and has wide alleyways on both sides and in the rear. It has ten exits, besides the main one in front. But, in addition to these, outside stairways are being constructed, leading from the galleries to the alleys, so that in case of a fire alarm each gallery will have separate exits, thus preventing the crowding of the people in the upper portion of the house upon those in the lower part, and insuring the almost instantaneous emptying of the auditorium. As additional precautions, the theater possesses an electric fire-alarm connected with the fire-patrol house; there are five fire-plugs to the house, with hose attached to each; fifty buckets are kept constantly filled with water; there are two stand-pipes, with fire-ladders, outside, extending to the roof, and every bit of scenery in the theater is treated with a solution that renders it almost absolutely fire-proof. If the same precautions were observed in all the theaters and public halls of the country, such calamities as those of Brooklyn and Vienna would be rendered impossible.

ILLINOIS.—The annual meeting of the Illinois State Grange was held at Mattoon, Coles county. A large number of delegates and visitors were present. The full number of delegates is 116, ninety-three of whom were present, quite a number being women. Senator Horace H. Clark delivered the address of welcome on behalf of the citizens of Mattoon; the response was given by Maj. E. Miller, of Greene county. Mortimer Whitehead, Past Master of the New Jersey State Grange, made an eloquent and lengthy address explaining the "Aims and Objects of the Order." The next meeting will be held in December, 1882, at Belleville.

WISCONSIN.—The yearly meeting of the State Grange of Wisconsin convened at Milwaukee. The annual report of the Treasurer showed the total receipts during the year were $4,432.93; disbursements, $4,002.87; leaving a balance of $430.06 in the treasury. The Secretary's report shows that 121 granges are in existence in the State, having a membership of 3,060. Four subordinate granges were organized during the year, and 393 members acquired by initiating. The following officers were elected: Master, C. F. Carr, Beloit; Steward, A. Sprague; Chaplain, L. Brainerd; Treasurer, J. Cochrane; Secretary, C. L. Hurley; Gatekeeper, E. Wood; Correspondent, Mrs. C. Sherwin; Executive Committee, C. F. Carr, R. D. Forrest; Trustee, J. E. Williams; State Purchasing Agent, E. Nash.

Lynch Law in Washington Territory.

A telegram from Seattle, in Washington Territory, says: James Sullivan and William Howard were arrested here to-day on a charge of the murder of George R. Reynolds, a young man whom they waylaid and shot last night. The prisoners were brought before a magistrate for preliminary examination. Evidence of their guilt is most conclusive. The feeling was intense, and at the close of the examination a Committee of Safety forced its way into the court-room, and, overpowering the officers, took the prisoners. Sullivan and Howard were taken a short distance and hanged. Their bodies were left suspended, and a crowd numbering 400 then proceeded to the county jail, and, overpowering the guards and breaking down the doors of a cell, took out Benjamin Payne, who was confined for the murder of Police-Officer Sears. He was taken to the place where the bodies of Sullivan and Howard were suspended, and hanged.

The bodies were left hanging some time, and then given over to the Coroner. The Committee of Safety continues its organization, and have issued a notice that persons guilty of highway robbery in the city will, if arrested, receive the penalty of death in a summary manner.

A Madman's Butchery.

A blood-curdling tragedy was enacted near Lancaster, Gerrard county, Ky. James A. Wilmot, a farmer in good circumstances, was rendered temporarily insane by brooding over a debt of $400 which he owed to a neighbor. His insanity assumed the homicidal type, and culminated in the wholesale slaughter of the members of his family. Getting out of bed during the night, the maniac sought an ax, and with that weapon slew his aged mother, his wife, and two daughters, and wound up by hanging himself in his barn. A son, aged 20 years, escaped by outrunning the maniac father. He aroused the neighbors, who repaired to the Wilmot mansion and found the body of James A. Wilmot hanging in his barn, the dead bodies of Elizabeth Wilmot, his mother, aged [illegible] years; Mattie and Mary Wilmot, his daughters, aged 19 and [illegible] years, lying in their beds, with one awful cut across the neck and blows from a saw, sharp ax, found lying on the floor of the room; also the body of Elizabeth Wilmot, his wife, lying on her face on the floor, with three or four gashes in her head and back made with the same death-dealing ax. The deadly blows had evidently been dealt while the victims were sleeping.

BY a decision of the State Supreme Court a large number of claims for bounty by volunteers who enlisted in the Union army are forever barred, the court holding that an offer of bounty by a Board of County Commissioners was not a contract in writing, and that actions to recover such bounty are barred by the statute of limitations.

HENRY C. SPAULDING, who was once famous as the inventor of liquid glue, was recently arrested at New Albany for drunkenness. He says that he sold the right to manufacture to a concern who made a round $1,000,000 out of it, but he got nothing, the buyer putting in a defense to the suit brought by Spaulding that the plaintiff was a minor when the contract was made.

JACOB CARTWRIGHT and Labuner Lundy, laborers in a Muncie sawmill, went into the engine-room to get a drink and commenced a playful scuffle, both plunging their heads under the connecting rod of the engine, which was running at a frightful speed. Both their heads were mashed to jelly, causing instant death. Cartwright was about 21 years of age; Lundy, 18.

DR. HAWN, Secretary of State, lately received a letter directed to "The Clerk of the State of Indiana," from a Justice of the Peace in a northern county, in which he says that "the Note of Republic" in his town has died, and his friends want him to apply for the position. He evidently thinks that there can be but one notary public in a town, and gives the Postmaster as reference as to his capabilities, etc.

A CLINTON county farmer went into Perrin's Bank at Lafayette, the other day, and informed Mr. Perrin that about twelve years ago, in paying out a lot of money to him over the counter of his bank, two bills had stuck together and hence he had received $10 more than the proper amount. The matter had been weighing on his conscience ever since, and he could not rest easy until he had made a clean breast of it, and restored the amount thus erroneously paid.

IN the case of the State vs. Creek, appealed to the Supreme Court for the purpose of testing the question as to the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace to try criminal cases where imprisonment might be part of the punishment, it has been decided that Justices have jurisdiction in such cases. The court holds—Judge Worden delivering the opinion—that Justices have jurisdiction in all cases where a fine is the only punishment that must be inflicted, though imprisonment in the county jail might, but need not necessarily, be imposed, but that they have no jurisdiction in cases where both fine and imprisonment must be assessed in punishment. The decision is a surprise to lawyers generally, as it was supposed the Legislature at its last session had taken cases of the kind mentioned from the jurisdiction of Justices, and these officers were acting accordingly.

A HORRIBLE murder was recently perpetrated near St. Paul, Shelby county, John Walton, a wealthy farmer, being the victim. Mr. Walton, before retiring for the night, sat down near a window in his sitting-room, for the purpose of reading the papers. While in this position, in view of the road, he was foully murdered, some unknown person shooting him in the head with a gun heavily loaded with large shot. The household soon spread the alarm, and Dr. Howard, of St. Paul, was called on to attend the dying man. The physician, as soon as he heard of the affair, suspected Aaron Frasier, a negro. Search was commenced for the fellow, and he was shortly found and arrested. When he knew that his crime had been discovered, Frasier broke down and made a full confession. He said he had been promised a large reward by O. M. Garrett, a neighbor living near, if he would kill Walton. Garrett was arrested and taken to a Justice's office, where before his trial was begun he obtained permission to go to an outhouse with a guard, when suddenly drawing a revolver he shot himself in the head inflicting a mortal wound. Watson denied that he hired Frasier to do the killing, but seemed to indicate that Walton's wife was most likely to be the one. Mrs. Walton was arrested and held in $5,000 bail. The people of Shelby county were greatly excited over the tragedy.

Guiteau's Suppressed Speech.

Guiteau, the assassin, furnished the Associated Press with a brief of his proposed address to the jury. It is like his usual drivel about the Deity having inspired the dastardly act. It is a combination of bombast, egotism and blasphemy. He starts out by saying: "If the court please, gentlemen of the jury, I am a patriot. To-day I suffer in bonds as a patriot. Washington was a patriot; Grant was a patriot. Washington led the armies of the Revolution through eight years of bloody war to victory and glory; Grant led the armies of the Union to victory and glory; and to-day the nation is prosperous and happy. To-day—Christmas, 1881—I suffer in bonds as a patriot because I had the inspiration and nerve to unite a great political party, to the end that the nation might be saved from another devastating war. To-day I suffer in bonds as a patriot. There is not the first element of murder in this case."

After harping at considerable length upon the old plea of inspiration, quoting Beecher, Talmage and other clergymen, and declaring that when he became President in 1884 he would clean out the Mormons right speedily, he closes thus to the jury:

"To hang a man in my mental condition on July 2, when I fired on the President, would be a lasting disgrace to the American people. The mothers and daughters of the republic are praying that you will vindicate my inspiration. I beg you do not get the Deity down on you by meddling with this case. I beg, for your own sake, and for the sake of the American people, and for the sake of generations yet unborn, that you let this case alone. You cannot afford to touch it. Let your verdict be that it was Deity's act, not mine. When the President was shot his Cabinet telegraphed to foreign nations that it was the act of a 'madman;' and it will be far better in every way that it be officially decided that it was the act of a 'madman.'"

Theater Fires.

		No. Persons.
1771.	Amsterdam	800
1772.	Saragossa	1,000
1781.	Paris, Palais Royal	500
1791.	Pisino, Istia	1,000
1807.	London, Sadler's Wells (false alarm)	18
1811.	Richmond, Va.	61
1846.	Quebec, Royal Theater	46
1853.	London, Coburg Theater (false alarm)	16
1865.	Edinburgh, Theater Royal	28
1867.	Philadelphia, American Varieties	15
1876.	Brooklyn Theater	284
1876.	Rouen, Theater des Arts	10
1876.	San Francisco, Chinese Theater (false alarm)	17
1878.	Calais, France	10
1878.	Ahmednugger, India	40
1881.	Cronstadt, Russia	8
1881.	Nice France	61
1881.	Vienna, Austria	984

Insurance satistics show that of the total of theater fires only 12 per cent. have taken place during a performance, and only 39 per cent. in the night time. But the disasters of Amsterdam, Saragossa, Pisino and Vienna are scarcely equaled in horror even by a wreck at sea.

FOR

BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life, by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the [illegible] that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the [illegible] organizations wrecked from [illegible] and excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. [illegible] Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

(Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlet giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoroughly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by

Indiana, April 11, '78.—The Remedy is working perfectly. [illegible]

Iowa, Oct. 26th, '78.—I am almost surprised at your Pastilles. They have worked like a charm on me. I am just twice as much of a man as I was before taking. I was on the verge of the grave, I thought, and there was no cure for me, but now I am in good hopes for a cure.

West Virginia, Aug. 28, 1878.—I received your medicine and I believe it has cured me, for which I am very thankful. Inclosed find $6. Please send me another box (No. 3) for a friend. You have done a great thing for me. I will send you all the orders I can.

From a Physician and Surgeon.

Missouri, June 20.—Please forward me another box of the Pastilles. The patient on whom I have used most of one box, in addition to [illegible], is fast recovering, and I think another will set him all right.

From a Druggist.

Maryland, Sept. 2, '79.—Last January we got a box of your Remedy for one of our customers, and it has made a perfect cure of him. We have another customer now suffering in the same way, and wish one No. 2 box.

What will please you most will be the pleasure of enjoying your meals, while passing over the beautiful prairies of Illinois and Iowa, in one of our magnificent Dining Cars that accompany all Through Express Trains. You get an entire meal, as good as is served in any first-class hotel, for seventy-five cents.

Appreciating the fact that a majority of the people prefer separate apartments for different purposes (and the immense passenger business of this line warranting it), we are pleased to announce that this Company runs Pullman Palace Sleeping Cars for sleeping purposes, and Palace Dining Cars for eating purposes only. One other great feature of our Palace Cars is a SMOKING SALOON where you can enjoy your "Havana" at all hours of the day.

Magnificent Iron Bridges span the Mississippi and Missouri rivers at all points crossed by this line, and transfers are avoided at Council Bluffs, Kansas City, Leavenworth and Atchison, connections being made in Union Depots.

AUBURN, IND., January [illegible] 1882.

Hon. Clarkson N. Potter died in New York last Monday.

It is currently reported in Washington, that Secretary Lincoln will retire from the cabinet in the spring.

It is rumored that Secretary Folger will be appointed to the supreme bench upon the retirement of Justice Hunt. It is thought that Congressman Crowley, of New York, will succeed Folger.

The subject of a canal across the state of Michigan, to connect Detroit with Lake Michigan, and thence west to the Mississippi river, is again being agitated in congress. But at present there seems to be no chance that the bill will pass.

There was a state meeting of county surveyors in Indianapolis last week. They have a complete organization and are to hold annual meetings for the discussion of questions and laws relating to their official duties. The next regular meeting will be on the second Tuesday in January, 1883.

The search for the lost Artic exploring vessel, "Jeannette," still goes on, and vessels are now fitting up to proceed to the northern waters as soon as the ice melts next spring. In the meantime, parties are out all along the accessible parts of the north coast of Siberia in the hope that the missing boats and their crews may come to land.

Scoville, last week, in his argument in the Guiteau case, made, the following pointed allusions to Conkling, Grant and Arthur: But I tell you gentlemen of the jury, back of this prosecution is an influence which I have felt and which you may feel, gentlemen, before this trial is concluded. There are politicians who seek to hide their own shame behind the disgrace of this poor prisoner and make him a scapegoat for their crime. I did not intend, gentlemen of the jury, to take up this feature of the case, but when I find the power and influence of this government used against me in denying the small pittance that I have asked for a fair and impartial trial and the small facilities needed for a proper defense, I do not propose to keep quiet. I say that such men as Grant and Conkling and Arthur are morally and intellectually responsible for this crime. Mr. Conkling shall not escape, shall not shirk the responsibility of the state of things that led to this act, and he shall not escape the condemnation of the American people if I can help it, for his share in this disgraceful scramble for office that led to a conflict with the chosen ruler of this great nation and led this poor, insane man to compass what they would have hailed with satisfaction, as would probably hundreds of other politicians, if it could occur other than through assassination, the removal of Garfield who stood in the way of their unrighteous and disgraceful struggle for offices. Neither shall Grant escape that condemnation to which he is so justly subjected when coming from Mexico, and coming with undue haste to throw his own name into this petty quarrel about a small office in the republican party, and sought to foment the differences that had sprung up. I am not going to see the misdeeds of these men, high in power, visited upon the head of this poor, insane man, if I can help it. This clamor for his blood is not for the purpose of avenging Garfield, or of satisfying justice, but their theory is this: If it can be shown that this was an act of a sane man then these politicians in high places will say, "of course we are not responsible for the act of a sane man; to be sure, we had some differences, but then it could never have led a sane man to such an act." But on the contrary, gentlemen of the jury, what is the effect of your verdict if you acquit him as an insane man. Why the people will say some one is at fault; they say we will fix the blame upon the heads and hearts of those men who waged war upon our poor dead president until it drove this poor insane man from reading daily in the papers what Grant says, what Conkling says, and from constantly thinking upon it, to his insane act of killing the president. And there are men in high places, the really culpable ones, who will go down to posterity with a stigma upon their names and the detestation of their countrymen fastened upon their memories. Recess. Mr. Scoville's denunciation of Conkling and others created a profound sensation in the court room. Soon as the recess was announced Scoville was surrounded by ladies and gentlemen and congratulated upon his "fearless exposition."

SEED.

THE LARGEST IN THE WORLD.

CORN AND WATERMELONS.

CORN.—Our "GIANT" Corn is a new and distinct variety, and is without the best that any farmer ever grew. The grains are as large as the average size chestnut; the finest white dent ever grown; full, rich in starch, perfect hardy, and never failing to grow a strong and vigorous stalk, with firm, deep roots. The ears are uniform and of very large size. It will yield more than any other variety that can be raised, averaging from THREE to SIX EARS to the stalk. It is taking the place of all other varieties upon its first trial. It is matured, and can be gathered in TEN WEEKS, and grows as successfully in the North as the South.

WATERMELONS.—Our "MIXON" Watermelons are the largest and finest in the World in every instance, and grow in any section of the country. Their average weight is from 75 to 125 POUNDS. The flesh is of a blood-red, very solid, luscious, crisp and sugary,—far surpassing all other varieties, and, although a melon of such an enormous weight, there is barely half an inch rind. They are pronounced the finest shipping melon in the World. It will pay any farmer to try a sample package.

Corn—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00, and $5.00 per bushel. Watermelons—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00. Address all orders to the

A Fine Bible.

We were shown a new edition of the bible the other day, that is unquestionably the best ever sold in this part of the country. The type is large and clear, and the illustrations are of the very best, great pains having been taken to make them natural and correct. The costumes of the High Priests, the tabernacle with its furniture and coverings, are all drawn, so as to show not only the shape and make of these articles, but the color as well as the gold and the bronze vessels. There are 2,000 fine illustrations, and the book contains 2,080 pages. It has the celebrated Cruden's Concordance complete, a bible dictionary, the Apocrypha, the life of Christ, a history of the bible and of each of its books, the Psalms and an appendix in which is the new translation of the New Testament, so that readers can compare it with the common edition. It has an account of the recent explorations of the Bible Lands with maps and pictures of the leading cities. A new and valuable feature is the showing in natural colors, of the plants etc. mentioned in the bible, and illustrations of its natural history, antiquities etc. This splendid work is being sold by J. F. Morr, who will canvass the entire county. Every student of the bible or of bible history, and every Sunday school worker should have a copy of this great family work.

—W. H. Dirrim and R. C. Baxter, of Smithfield, are agents for a choice work, the "Illustrated Museum of Antiquity." It is a work of rare interest and merit, and contains a lot of useful knowledge in regard to ancient times, manners and customs. Its illustrations are very useful as showing ancient furniture, arms, costumes, &c.

—The musical entertainment given a week ago last night under the supervision of Mr. Harry Gordon, was very fine. The class exhibited a knowledge of music which results only from continued application and good instruction. —A. W. Allen has moved into the residence recently vacated by Rev. Rettig, of political fame.

—John Blany has recovered from the effects of that ten pound boy and has gone to work again.

—The Wabash elevator has been turned into a carpenter shop, with Col. Et. Watson as foreman.

—Clyde Moore has come home. He left the Board of Trade in Chicago—that's where he was employed.

—Tavy Baldock has thrown up his clerkship and will prepare to "double up" and her too share his fortunes.

—Where is Fatty Umber, of the scythe snath factory? Guess its been too cold for the little fellow to be out.

—The protracted meeting at the Presbyterian church is yet progressing. The attendance is not as large as it should be.

—Myers & Brooks have dissolved partnership. We have the agricultural house in the south end that takes the cake.

—Charley Picker bought a new cab for his baby Saturday. Soothing syrup and catnip tea will "carry" 'em much more effectually.

—Mr. Humphrey and his new bride are keeping house in the rooms over the Physician's Drug Store. They are bound to live high.

—I am told that Jack Little will return to his old tramping ground and take control of the job work at the Republican office.

—Alf. Carter has a contract with C. C. Shaffer for furnishing hair material to stuff matresses, chairs, etc. He raises the crop on his upper lip.

—The Jackson township boys have organized a band. They were anxious to secure the services of a good teacher and I recommended my young friend Ora Shaffer, (Ora is leader of the Auburn band) and although they offered him $10 a night he refused. His business at the paint shop was too crowding. Chris. Baldock handled a "horn" very gracefully and probably he would be the "right man in the right place."

—The boys in this corner would like to see A. W. Allen nominated for sheriff. He'll slide into that office as though he was greased.

—Doc. Cowan vaccinated Chris. Baker's family last week which accounts for his not getting around to see his other patients, the same week.

—The hub and spoke factory whistle now disturbs the morning slumbers of the south end man who has his betterhalf build the fires with green hub blocks.

—Hod Kircher had a nice little dog but said dog undertook to ditch a Wabash train, and now he trips in the land where old dog Tray et. al. make their home.

—Miss Frankie Ryan has a splendid reputation in the south end as a first-class music instructor. My authority is so reliable that I can recommend her to all our citizens.

—Although the weather is quite bracing we occasionally have the festive book agent call on us. One of the la da dah fellows, in this line, called at the shop Monday.

—Frank N. Larimore, writes his friends from Chicago, that he arrived there, top side up, one day last week. Frank is certainly a conundrum unsolved.

—Two of our south end boys assisted a blind fiddler in getting up a dance at the Junction, last week, and we are told that they received "big pay" for their generosity.

—Mrs. Johnnie Specht and her son Eric are now stopping with their mother, Mrs. Lowry. I hear that Johnny is engaged as brakeman on the B. & O. road.

—Samuel Puffenberger is now stopping with the family of Chas. Klotz. He will probably go to Texas in the spring and make his home with John Ralston, esq., a brother-in-law.

—Meetings at the Baptist church are largely attended, and the usual crowd will soon follow the converts to Cedar creek where the ceremony of baptism is performed.

—I have my eye on a young masher holding fourth on Ninth street, and if this should meet his gaze I hope he will "stop that fooling;" otherwise I caution him to look a "lettle ou-dt."

—J. Shad. Rhodenbaugh drives a new horse down here. Shad is becoming quite a horse trader, and it is said that he looks over a horse remarkably well—that is over the back of them.

—Oat. Aultman has quit A. Stutz and a young Freshman from Fort Wayne steps in his shoes. We know he is a "Frenchy" as we heard a south end girl say, as she grasped his hand, mon ami boy.

—Geo. Foster came down Saturday to look up his interests in the lumber trade. Geo. was too utterly full to utter (of the promising future, of course) and said he would give away forty acres to be a boy again.

—Judge Rose on the bench (judge is good) and the extra session of court begins. While Mr. Rose is a nice gentleman, we have too many democrats in the south end for him to ever bloom at the polls.

—Mrs. Wm. Hoffman living west of town, a daughter of M. Sheets, is lying in a critical condition caused by vaccination. Her limbs are badly swollen and one eye is supposed to be ruined forever.

—The boys in the south end have struggled hard in fighting the "tiger" since "swearing off day;" but they got away with the tigar so far all the same, especially the writer—yum, yum!

—The south end has its share of female gossips. The voice of scandal should never be noticed. All vicious expressions in such manner disturb character, morals and educated sense in any community.

—Johnny Zollars, who recently had a large piece of glass taken from his foot that had been there several years, occasionally feels some pain in the limb in which the foot was fastened.

—Judge Picker lives in the south end. The judge splits his own wood and only having one arm, he made himself a maul. It was manufactured from a green hub block, and comes down with terrible force—but the greatest difficulty is to raise it up.

—I am told that Tarney's butcher is not a success in capturing bovines. It may be right occasionally to take a bull by the horns, but it is well to bear in mind that the horns belong to the bull.

—There was a wrangle among neighbors in the south end Sunday. One of them went over and said, "I have come to see you about your boy. He's been throwing rotten apples at my windows and calls my wife old Mrs Megooselum. Now, this makes me tired." "Is that so?" responded the other. "Well, I have a complaint to make against that young hopeful of yours. He chalked my wood-shed all over with a picture of my wife driving me out of the back door with a kettle of water and a broom."—"Thank! am in for civil service reform within our own families," and the boys don't know what they were "licked" for as yet.

—The boys down here give Jack Ralston a big patronage in his new enterprise. Jack is an old-timer among us, and although we miss his manly actions and "devilish tricks" we cannot but help wishing him a large trade and lots 'o fun.

—Many of the boys will remember Geo. Heidt, who about a year ago, was employed at Pommert's barber shop. One day last week George crossed the dark, unknow river, and is now enjoying that invisible home where sin and sorrow are not known.

—Young Doc Fox has been vaccinated five times, and he says, "No good yet." A good sized sprout from a weeping willow, applied to the spot where nature intended to bring the young lad to America, would be much more constitutional than a vaccination scab.

—I am glad to learn that Frank Leas has secured the position of baggage master on the B. & O. I have every wish to see Frank do well; but how he expects to handle a New York belle's Saratoga is beyond my comprehension, as he's shaped too much like the trunk—"wide through."

—Janitor Wolf, who keeps the county hub in order, don't like the new vaccination law. The teacher sent his boy home from school and if Hank could found time that morning this globe would have been turned upside down, and the state of Indiana pulverized with a stuffed club.

—The McKinley boys, well known as tough cusses all over the county, were raising a terrible racket on "Arsenic Avenue," Saturday evening and were arrested by Chas. Smith. D. Moody signed their bail bond, or otherwise they would have kept company with the b'hoys at the Leas house.

—John Bunch had a light attack of the "incubus ephialtes," last night, and imagined that another burglar was in the house. John reached for him; his arm projected through the window pane, and when he awoke he had a death grip on a cow's tail that was quietly "chewing her cud" on the opposite side of the street.—"Dreams are delightful."

—I hear it said that Tom. Gross will not embark in the saloon trade much longer. Tom. has no "stony" heart, no sah! When a lady gave him a temperance tract, Monday, he went across the way to a brother craftsman and read the entire contents (August can't read) and made some appropriate and touching remarks, after which August—set 'em up.

—Madame rumor tells me that one of our young men, whose father is well-to-do, will soon marry an intelligent, cultured lady of Fort Wayne. Our sympathies are with the female, and if this item should chance to meet the "apple of her eye" she will do well to take Diamond Jack's advice: Never marry a man who has nothing but money.

—Edward Orr, at Corunna, I am told, has twenty head of choice sheep that weigh together 3100 pounds. He had one killed by a worthless dog recently that he prized highly. L. J. Miller, esq., (the county treasurer now, and the next one too) is also said to have a splendid flock. This part of the county is rapidly growing in wealth and popularity; the farming community are the substantial "spokes to the wheel of enterprise."

—A meeting was held by the A B C organization last Saturday afternoon, in a rear room of Case's block, for the purpose of discussing the best and most efficient method of conducting the spring elections, and also the importance of vaccination. I intended to be present, but when I found I was tardy my first thought was to peep over the transom. There sat the president, pro tem. with his shanks spread all over a wood box, and bringing his hammer down cried out, "girls, go slow." This remark ended my interest, and I went down stairs and kicked myself full of holes.

—Revival meetings are the evening amusements for the festive youth and the Turban hat masher. After services they meet in convention and comment upon the remarks of some "converted sinner" in a criticising manner. They don't take much stock in them, so to speak. Its true some are good while others are not. My way of sorting them is: The man who talks sensibly, calmy and briefly does so from a good motive. Theone who makes his voice ring as though he was delivering a stump speech to an audience at Fort Wayne, and exerts every muscle in his frame to make a jumping-jack of himself—the man who is so good that he wants Gabriel to blow his trumpet right off, you will do well to find out as soon as possible what relation he is to your dry goods or grocery store.

Yours all over,
DIAMOND JACK.

THE ROCK TOMB OF BRADORE.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

A drear and desolate shore!
Where no tree unfolds its leaves,
And never the spring wind weaves
Green grass for the hunter's tread;
A land forsaken and dead,
Where the ghostly icebergs go
And come with the ebb and flow
Of the waters of Bradore!

A wanderer, from a land
By summer breezes fanned,
Looked around him, awed, subdued,
By the dreadful solitude,
Hearing alone the cry
Of sea-birds clanging by,
The crash and grind of the floe,
Wail of wind and wash of tide.
"O wretched land!" he cried,
"Land of all lands the worst,
God forsaken and curst!
Thy gates of rock should show
The words of the Tuscan seer
Read in the realm of Wo!
Hope entereth not here!"

Lo! at his feet there stood
A block of smooth larch wood
Beside a rock-closed cave
By Nature fashioned for a grave,
Safe from the ravening bear
And fierce fowl of the air,
Wherein to rest was laid
A twenty summers' maid,
Whose blood had equal share
Of the lands of vine and snow,
Half-French, half-Esquimaux.
In letters uneffaced
Upon the block were traced
The grief and wo of man,
And thus the legend ran:
"We loved her!
Words cannot tell how well!
We loved her!
God loved her!
And called her home to peace and rest.
We love her!"

The stranger paused and read.
"O winter land!" he said,
"Thy right to be I own:
God leaves thee not alone.
And if thy fierce winds blow
Over thy wastes of rock and snow,
And at thy iron gates
The ghostly iceberg waits,
Thy homes and hearts are dear;
Thy [illegible] o'er thy sacred dust
Is sanctified by hope and trust.
God's love and man's are here.
Still wheresoe'er it goes
Love makes its atmosphere.
Its flowers of Paradise
Take root in the eternal ice,
And bloom through Polar snows!"

A MAN'S LOVE.

Hans Behren's picturesque home was high up among the lowlands of the Hartz mountains. Loving his profession of forester for its own sake, his contentment and happiness in the position fate had assigned him were complete; nor had he the shadow of an anxiety, save for his one motherless child, Kathleen. He had educated her in a city school, and during her absence her place had been filled by Fritz Linden, the orphan son of Hans' foster-sister, who, apprenticed to his uncle, was also studying the profession of forester.

Since Kathleen's return a strong attachment had grown up between the cousins, and Hans was glad to think that a young man he liked so much might become his son-in-law and relieve him of all further care for his daughter. He therefore brought the young people together as much as he could, and, now that a professional opening offered itself in a station some twenty miles distant, he hastened to secure it for Fritz, thus putting him in the way for further promotion.

As for the young man, though it separated him from his love, it made him glad, for would it not the sooner bring them together? It was not an advancement to marry on, but it was a step in that direction, and he was pleased and hopeful to have got so far.

So he had gathered together his slender possessions, and in a few days he was to depart for his new home, bidding farewell to the old home, so dear in all its associations.

It was then that he resolved not to leave Kathleen without speaking his mind, and securing his happiness from her own lips. He had been working steadily all the summer's afternoon in the forest, when he saw her coming toward him with a bunch of violets in her hands.

"See, Fritz," she said, "what a lot of dear violets I have found. Of all the flowers they are my favorites; they are so lowly, so unambitious. All unlike yourself in that," she added with a radiant smile.

"Do you dislike my ambition, Kathleen?" he asked.

"No," she answered a little sadly, "though it is taking you away from us."

"And for whose sake do you think I am going? For who do you think I work so hard?" he asked, eagerly.

"How can I tell?" she said saucily; but, meeting the gaze of his deep blue eyes, she dropped her head and blushed.

"Do you care to know?" he resumed, advancing a step nearer to her, and seizing the hand hanging listlessly at her side, while she buried her blushing face in the other, that held the flowers, neither speaking nor stirring. She knew what was coming; she longed for it yet she dreaded it; but she seemed rooted to the spot by some magic spell.

"Kathleen, I love you—I want to make you my wife. I seek some position where I could offer you as comfortable a home as the one you would leave, for I would not think it honorable to ask you to share a less comfortable one; but, once I have attained such a position, and a home and a range of my own, can you not give me a hope, Kathleen, that you will so supremely bless my life? Ah, answer me, dearest."

But she did not answer him a word, only buried her face deeper in the fragrant flowers; but neither did she resist him when, putting both his arms around her, he drew her closer to him, holding her in his strong embrace and pressing passionate kisses on her bowed head.

"Speak to me, love," he whispered; "only one tiny word, Kathleen."

With a passionate impulse she threw both arms around his neck, scattering a fragrant shower of white violets over him.

"I love you, Fritz," she murmured, and, breaking away from him, she ran to the house.

The next day the young man left for his new station. It was a full month before he found an opportunity to revisit his old home. All was as he had left it, except Kathleen, and she seemed changed—how he scarcely knew.

There was a shyness, a reserve about her manner, less of the girlish simplicity which had always charmed him, and much more of the lady; a certain constraint which he had never noticed before. When he spoke to Hans about it, the latter pooh-poohed it, saying that it was the way with girls, and that approaching matrimony always sobered them.

And, although Fritz left his old home with a certain anxious foreboding, youth is so hopeful and love so trustful that his fears were soon soothed, if not entirely forgotten, by the friendly letters which he received every week from old Hans, full of accounts of their welfare and tender messages from Kathleen.

But one autumn day he received two letters. The one in the cramped handwriting of his old master he laid aside, to tear the second, bearing a huge Governmental seal, eagerly open. Here at last was his dream realized, for his promotion had come. He was offered the fosterei of Langenfeld, with a good income and certain privileges on account of his lonely position.

For it was lonely, high up in the moorlands where the air is always impregnated with snow, the vegetation stunted and overgrown with lichen and hardy mosses, which are swept nine months in the year by wintry blasts. Far above the line of flowery meads or thriving corn fields this dreary home of cold weather harbored only stunted trees, starved sedges, or hardy lichen. His nearest neighbors would be five hours distant, in a small mining town, and the weather is seldom propitious for much intercourse.

"Will Kathleen be happy there?" was his only thought; as for himself, he thrilled with life and delight at the prospect of so lonely a position with her.

He stretched himself up to his full sturdy height and kissed the letter which brought him prospects of so great happiness. With his bronzed cheeks, his deep, piercing blue eyes, shadowed by overhanging brows which gave to his face a grave expression, Fritz Linden was a fine-looking man, and one not to be easily swerved from his steady purpose.

Full of eager joy for himself and hesitating consideration for Kathleen, he opened the other letter, and, as his eyes flew over its pages, his mouth set and his face grew hard and ashy pale. When he had come to the end he crushed the letter savagely in his hand, and, lifting his sugar-loaf-shaped green huntsman's hat from off a brow whose fairness contrasted strangely with the bronzed cheek beneath, he muttered to himself some solemn vow, and, throwing the letter far from him, he groveled on the earth in a passionate outburst of tears.

The letter that changed the whole current of Fritz's being, ran thus:

MY BELOVED SON: Where shall I find words to break so grievous news to you, for the grief is yours, poor boy, as well as mine. Our Kathleen is ours no longer. Yesterday she disappeared with the young Herr von Dona. All I can learn is that he has been seen much with her lately in the woods, and they were recognized at the I—— station together. So it all ends. To have deceived, not only her doting old father, but also her affianced husband, shows a lack of feeling and honor which I can never forgive, no more than you can, my poor Fritz; so we must neither attempt to follow nor to bring her back to us. She is dead to us, and henceforth I have only you, my dearly loved son, to lean upon. Come to me when you can leave, for the blow is mortal, and I feel I have not long to totter under its crushing weight. We can but grieve together, so come to your affectionate uncle,

HANS BEHRENS.

So there was a quiet meeting of the two men struck by the same blow; the one being so much nearer his grave by it, the other having formed through it a grave for his pride and hopes and youth. Fritz accepted the Government position; for what place could be too isolated, too lonely for him now? He craved some savage spot wherein to hide his grief, where he could pass the rest of his days far from a world he had always found so treacherous.

"Fritz," old Hans had said in parting with his nephew, "if she ever crosses your path in the future, when I am dead and gone, deal kindly with her for my sake, if you cannot for your own. And now farewell, and may we know resignation, if happiness is denied us, my son."

"Amen!" Fritz answered solemnly, as he gave his uncle the desired promise.

From that day forth Fritz Linden had lived in the lonely forester's lodge, and since that day there has passed nine long, uneventful years. Old Hans Behrens had died before the first one was out, and Fritz was left without a friend in the world. He did his duty scrupulously and conscientiously, and was respected and feared by his dependents; but no one came nearer the lonely man during all those long years. His charities were inexhaustible, and he was kind and even sympathetic if any one was sick or in trouble, but he was none the less unapproachable and cold, never relaxing in his stern demeanor, nor had his grief grown less by brooding over it as the weary years passed slowly away. One day sped with him like another. A frugal breakfast at daylight, and an equally frugal repast at night, after which he read and studied until 10, then went to bed. There were almost never any visitors to the isolated Forsthaus, and his visits to the nearest town were too rare and too brief to encourage sociability with his neighbors there.

The beginning of the winter 18— saw the snow set in earlier and more stormily than usual, and, after a steady fall for ten days, it lay so high upon the ground that the only way out of the house was by its roof. This was not unusual, and, after it had hardened over, the inmates turned out to their several vocations as though they challenged so slight a thing to incommode them.

One night it began to snow again, and the wind howled and beat against the house as though it would wrench it from the firm-set clamps and chains, and level it at one gust. Fritz had been belated at work with some of his men that night, and as they were fighting their way slowly and painfully through the storm and darkness he had suddenly stumbled against a crouching object half buried in the snow, which, when extricated, proved to be a woman clutching a child in her arms, and to all appearances dead.

The men hastily improvised a litter out of one of their wraps, and shortly afterward they were standing in the dark passage of the Forsthaus, and Fritz was giving directions to his female servants, commanding that a warm room and bed be made ready and all restoratives applied to the unfortunate travelers, if haply they might still be brought back to life.

"The child," he said, "is really showing signs of reviving, and let me know whether its mother be alive or dead. As for you, my brave fellows, come in here and get something hot to drink with your supper."

And so he turned the woman over to his female servants. Had the unfortunate been a man, Fritz would have been the first at his bedside, but he avoided women, and such a case as this had not occurred before.

Presently a woman servant came in and reported that the woman was alive, but very ill and delirious, and Fritz ordered, if it were possible, that some one should make his way over to the nearest station next day and fetch a doctor.

For weeks this woman lay in his house hovering between life and death. Daily he inquired for her, and allowed his women servants to give up their whole time to nursing her and the child, but otherwise she did not interfere with his life. Once the child had run in his way, holding out its arms in astonishment and delight at the forester's gay trappings, but Fritz had passed her by gloomily, and sternly ordered that "every care and attention should be bestowed on her, but that she should be kept out of his way." And it never happened again.

After months of illness and convalescence, the sick woman was completely restored to health, and with her restoration spring also had set in, and she was anxious to proceed on her way.

Before going she craved to see the master and thank him in person, and though warned and dissuaded by all the inmates of the Forsthaus, she could not be induced to leave without doing so.

So one evening at twilight, just after his return, as he was disincumbering himself of his gun, a timid tap was heard at the door of his room, and the interloper being bid to enter, a woman softly opened the door and crossed the threshold.

"Who is it?" Fritz asked, standing with his back to the window, intent on examining his gun.

"The woman whom you have sheltered so long, sir. May I not be privileged to speak to you, or to thank you, sir?"

"I have done no more than common humanity demanded, and I do not love thanks," answered the master, turning to look at her. But when he did so he gasped and stood spell-bound.

The last rays of the failing light fell full on her slender figure, partially turned aside from him. His eyes caught the superb outline of shoulders, bust and waist, revealed by the close-fitting black dress, and the glorious great knot of bright hair drawn back from her pale cheek and coiled behind. With a wild bound he was at her side, and she turned her face toward him.

"Kathleen! My God! is it you?"

"Fritz!" she stammered, growing deadly pale; "not Fritz Linden?"

"It is," he said, turning from her, his face hardening. "Now, that you are here, it is well, and I can deliver the message your dead father left for you!"

"My father dead!" she gasped. "O, God, this also!" And she fell fainting at his feet.

Fritz turned and looked at her, and then, as if afraid of himself, strode to the bell-rope, and, summoning a servant with apparent unconcern, bade him remove the fainting woman to her apartment, ordering that, should she ask for a message from him, she should be given a note he would presently write, and then be sped on her way with every comfort and dispatch.

Poor Kathleen! Her father dead, her one refuge gone, to whom, like a prodigal, she was returning to crave forgiveness, and to pray him to grant a home and his blessing, if not to her, at least to her unoffending child. Where should she now turn? Led away by childish vanity, she had listened to the promises of the young Count Dona that he would make her a lady and elevate her to his own rank. Firmly believing the mock ceremony that had taken place to have been a true marriage, on his subsequent desertion and her consequent cruel disillusion she had bravely struggled to gain her own and her child's living, and for years had sought by steady work and exemplary conduct to deaden the shame that preyed upon her heart, till the little story becoming known in the little community where she had sought refuge, she was forced in her despair to go away, which led her to seek once more the love and protection of her father's roof.

Without taking into account the rigorous season of the year, the impassable state of the roads, or her own slender resources, she had hastily put together her few belongings, and with her child in her arms had set forth in a condition of half-dream, with only sense enough to cover her little one from the cold and to ask her way, till, wandering she knew not how long, the snow clogged her footsteps, the chill air benumbed her, and she knew nothing till she found herself in the forester's house. "Fritz's house," she moaned, as she lay prostrate on her bed in an agony of grief and despair.

As she lay thus, Barbara, the servant, came into the room, carrying the child in her arms.

"Madame," she said, "the little one is surely very sick; her face burns with fever, and she is moaning, as if in pain. See, she does not even ask to go to you."

Kathleen was at her side instantly. She seized the child, and, pressing it convulsively to her heart, "Oh, my darling," she cried, "do not you, too, leave me! Barbara," she said, addressing the woman, "I cannot have her sick. I must leave this house this very night. I must go."

"Then, madame, you will imperil the little one's life, for she is sickening of child's illness, and will require careful nursing and rest. The Her Forster will never allow you to go, madame. You do not know how good he is. If he knows the child is sick he will insist on you remaining." And before Kathleen could prevent her the woman had gone.

Kathleen knelt down by the bed, encircling her child in her arms. Presently a firm step passed along the floor. She did not need to look up. She knew who stood there.

"Kathleen," he said, and his voice sounded softer and huskier than it had the short hour before; "Kathleen, you must stay. You must not imperil your child's life by going. We shall not meet any more than we did before, for had you not sought me we had neither of us known that the same roof sheltered us two."

There was silence in the room, save for the little one's moans; then: "If you have any—any one—whom your long absence will render anxious I will send a messenger, if you will tell me to whom."

The great beads stood on Fritz's forehead. It had cost him much to say this.

"I have no one but my child."

"You are, then, a widow?"

She raised her head slowly, with her eyes on his, which watched her with a nameless fascination.

"I was never a wife," she said, "though I believed I was," and dropped her head again.

He stood in silence over her. His firm-set mouth worked ominously; he clenched his hands; some storm was brewing within him, but he beat it down. Finally he said, gravely:

"The doctor will be here to-morrow. Your child shall lack for nothing. May she be spared to you. Farewell!" He turned to leave the room.

"Fritz," she cried, holding out her clasped hands imploringly toward him; "Fritz, do not leave me!" for she felt this to be a farewell forever, and yet she knew that he loved her still, and she clung to him and could not bear that he should leave her thus.

He paused with his hand on the lock of the door. Then, coming toward her and resting it gently on her head, "Hush," he said, "you will disturb your child," and opening the door he quietly left the room.

After this Fritz went steadily and sternly about his daily work. He never saw Kathleen, but he understood that a fearful time was ensuing, and that she battling with death for the possession of her child, whose disease had been pronounced scarlet-fever, of the most virulent type. He still loved her blindly, madly; the sight of her had brought him back from death to life; he knew her free and yet he hesitated. How could he forget all that was past with the child always before him? A fierce jealousy consumed him. The child might die! This thought he brooded over till it became his one wild hope and desire.

One day he met Kathleen in the passage. He was startled by the change in her. Her face was wan and pinched with care; her eyes, unnaturally large, were dim and sunken with sleeplessness and weeping. Her whole aspect was piteous. She clung for support against the walls as she slowly stumbled along.

When Fritz saw her grief he felt ashamed of his wicked hope. All his generous nature sprang up in love and protection toward her and her little one.

"Kathleen," he said, taking her hand, "let me nurse your child with you. I have had much experience with the sick; I may be able to help you."

She opened the door and drew him into the room. The nurse who watched the child motioned them to be quiet, and, as the mother took her place beside the couch, whispered, "She sleeps—this is the crisis," and left the room.

Kathleen knelt down by the bedside, leaning her wan cheek on the child's little hand. A lovely, tender expression rested on her face. She was praying. Fritz stood behind her and looked on. The child's little face, which he had seen last so radiant and sunny, was wan and deathlike. The silken, flaxen hair hung over the pillow, matted and damp, while the breath came so softly that she hardly seemed to breathe at all.

His breast heaved, and the scalding tears chased one another down his cheeks—the first he had shed since he had learned Kathleen's untruth toward him.

And so the hours passed in silence, while a blessed hope and joy crept into Fritz's heart; for was he not there alone with his beloved and the little one whose life he now craved as much as he hitherto wished for its death?

At the first gray streak of dawn the child opened her eyes.

"Mother," she said softly.

Kathleen arose.

"Saved!" she cried, "Oh, merciful God, I thank Thee."

"Amen!" answered a deep voice behind her.

"Fritz! you here?"

"I have been here all night, love. My prayers have gone up to heaven with yours for the recovery of your—our child. May it not be so, Kathleen?"

She disengaged one hand from the child's neck and passed it around his, while she laid the other, clasping the tiny hand, into his open palm.

"Yes, ours," she murmured, "our white violet."

Bob Burdette's Description of a Battle.

Freehold used to be called Monmouth Court-house. I don't know why the name was changed. I suppose to distinguish it from Monmouth, Illinois. The unpleasantness of Monmouth transpired on the 28th of June, 1778. Sir Henry Clinton was on his way from Philadelphia to New York, and being in somewhat of a hurry, took the branch at Monmouth Junction, and was going on by the Freehold and New York Agricultural Railway. At Freehold General Lee, with a select committee of the best citizens, overtook Sir Henry and began the hospitable task of destroying him and his friends from off the face of the earth. But by and by, General Lee became stricken with remorse and ordered his troops to get for the timber, and during the walking match that ensued George W. Washington came up and looked in amazement at the retreating, panic-stricken Americans, who were at that time whipped clean out of their boots. Approaching General Lee, the father of his country looked him right in the eye, and delivered the following remarks, in an earnest manner:

Then he sailed in and rattled the British grenadiers, and whooped them along the road to New York like a house afire. Night put a stop to the picnic, and during the night the Sassenach folded his tents like the Modocs, and silently vamoosed the ranche.

A Boston man at a theater asked a Gainsborough hat with a girl in it whether she would not allow him to have a momentary view of the stage. The girl replied that it was the only hat she had. He gallantly offered to contribute a half-dollar toward a new one.

EXCITEMENT IN ROCHESTER.

The Commotion Caused by the Statement of a Physician.

An unusual article from the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle was reprinted in this paper recently, and has been a subject of much conversation, both in professional circles and on the street. Apparently it caused even more commotion in Rochester, as the following from the same paper shows:

Dr. J. B. Henion, who is well known, not only in Rochester but in nearly every part of America, sent an extended article to this paper a few days since, which was duly published, detailing his remarkable experience and rescue from what seemed to be certain death. It would be impossible to enumerate the personal inquiries which have been made at our office as to the validity of the article, but they have been so numerous that further investigation of the subject was deemed an editorial necessity.

With this end in view a representative of this paper called on Dr. Henion, at his residence on St. Paul street, when the following interview occurred: "That article of yours, Doctor, has created quite a whirlwind. Are the statements about the terrible condition you were in and the way you were rescued such as you can sustain?"

"Every one of them and many additional ones. Few people ever get so near the grave as I did and then return, and I am not surprised that the public think it marvelous. It was marvelous."

"How in the world did you, a physician, come to be brought so low?"

"By neglecting the first and most simple symptoms. I did not think I was sick. It is true I had frequent headaches; felt tired most of the time; could eat nothing one day and was ravenous the next; felt dull, indefinite pains, and my stomach was out of order, but I did not think it meant anything serious."

"But have these common ailments anything to do with the fearful Bright's disease which took so firm a hold on you?"

"Anything? Why, they are the sure indications of the first stages of that dreadful malady. The fact is, few people know or realize what ails them, and I am sorry to say that too few physicians do either."

"That is a strange statement, Doctor."

"But it is a true one. The medical profession have been treating symptoms instead of diseases for years, and it is high time it ceased. We doctors have been clipping off the twigs when we should strike at the root. The symptoms I have just mentioned or any unusual action or irritation of the water channels indicate the approach of Bright's disease even more than a cough announces the coming of consumption. We do not treat the cough, but try to help the lungs. We should not waste our time trying to relieve the headaches, stomach, pains about the body or other symptoms, but go directly to the kidneys, the source of most of these ailments."

"This, then, is what you meant when you said that more than one-half the deaths which occur arise from Bright's disease, is it, Doctor?"

"Precisely. Thousands of so-called diseases are torturing people to-day, when in reality it is Bright's disease in some one of its many forms. It is a Hydra-headed monster, and the slightest symptoms should strike terror to every one who has them. I can look back and recall hundreds of deaths which physicians declared at the time were caused by paralysis, apoplexy, heart disease, pneumonia, malarial fever and other common complaints which I see now were caused by Bright's disease."

"And did all these cases have simple symptoms at first?"

"Every one of them, and might have been cured as I was by the timely use of the same remedy—Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. I am getting my eyes thoroughly opened in this matter, and think I am helping others to see the facts and their possible danger, also. Why, there is no end of truths bearing on this subject. If you want to know more about it, go and see Mr. Warner himself. He was sick the same as I, and is the healthiest man in Rochester to-day. He has made a study of this subject, and can give you more facts than I can. Go, too, and see Dr. Lattimore, the chemist, at the University. If you want facts, there are any quantity of them showing the alarming increase of Bright's disease, its simple and deceptive symptoms, and that there is but one way by which it can be escaped."

Fully satisfied of the truth and force of the Doctor's words, the reporter bade him good day and called on Mr. Warner at his establishment on Exchange street. At first, Mr. Warner was inclined to be reticent, but learning the information desired was about the alarming increase of Bright's disease, his manner changed instantly and he spoke very earnestly:

"It is true that Bright's disease has increased wonderfully, and we find, by reliable statistics, that in the past ten years its growth has been 250 per cent. Look at the prominent men it has carried off: Everett, Sumner, Chase, Wilson, Carpenter, Bishop Haven and others. This is terrible and shows a greater growth than that of any other complaint. It must be plain to every one that something must be done to check this increase or there is no knowing where it may end."

"Do you think many people are afflicted with it to-day who do not realise it, Mr. Warner?"

"Hundreds of thousands. I have a striking example of this truth which has just come to my notice. A prominent professor in the New Orleans medical college was lecturing before his class on the subject of Bright's disease. He had various fluids under microscopic analysis, and was showing the students what the indications of this terrible malady were. In order to draw the contrast between healthy and unhealthy fluids he had provided a vial the contents of which were drawn from his own person. 'And now, gentlemen,' he said, 'as we have seen the unhealthy indications, I will show you how it appears in a state of perfect health,' and he submitted his own fluid to the usual test. As he watched the results his countenance suddenly changed—his color and command both left him, and in a trembling voice he said: 'Gentlemen, I have made a painful discovery; I have Bright's disease of the kidneys,' and in less than a year he was dead."

"You believe, then, that it has no symptoms of its own and is frequently unknown even by the person who is afflicted with it?"

"It has no symptoms of its own and very often none at all. Usually no two people have the same symptoms, and frequently death is the first symptom. The slightest indications of any kidney difficulty should be enough to strike terror to any one. I know what I am talking about, for I have been through all the stages of kidney disease."

"You know of Dr. Henion's case?"

"Yes, I have both read and heard of it."

"It is very wonderful, is it not?"

"A very prominent case, but no more so than a great many others that have come to my notice as having been cured by the same means."

"You believe, then, that Bright's disease can be cured."

"I know it can. I know it from the experience of hundreds of prominent persons who were given up to die by both their physicians and friends."

"You speak of your own experience, what was it?"

"A fearful one. I had felt languid and unfitted for business for years, but I did not know what ailed me. When, however, I found it was kidney difficulty I thought there was little hope and so did the doctors. I have since learned that one of the physicians of this city pointed me out to a gentleman on the street one day, saying: 'There goes a man who will be dead within a year.' I believe his words would have proven true if I had not fortunately secured and used the remedy now known as Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure."

"And this caused you to manufacture it?"

"No, it caused me to investigate. I went to the principal cities with Dr. Craig, the discoverer, and saw the physicians prescribing and using it, and saw that Dr. Craig was unable, with his facilities, to supply the medicine to thousands who wanted it. I therefore determined, as a duty I owed humanity and the suffering, to bring it within their reach, and now it is known in every part of America, is sold in every drug store, and has become a household necessity."

The reporter left Mr. Warner, much impressed with the earnestness and sincerity of his statements, and next paid a visit to Dr. S. A. Lattimore at his residence on Prince street. Dr. Lattimore, although busily engaged upon some matters connected with the State Board of Health, of which he is one of the analysts, courteously answered the questions that were propounded him:

"Did you make a chemical analysis of the case of Mr. H. H. Warner some three years ago, Doctor?"

"Yes, sir."

"What did this analysis show you?"

"The presence of albumen and tube casts in great abundance."

"And what did the symptoms indicate?"

"A serious disease of the kidneys."

"Did you think Mr. Warner could recover?"

"No, sir. I did not think it possible. It was seldom, indeed, that so pronounced a case had, up to that time, ever been cured."

"Do you know anything about the remedy which cured him?"

"Yes, I have chemically analyzed it, and, upon critical examination, find it entirely free from any poisonous or deleterious substances."

We publish the foregoing statements in view of the commotion which the publicity of Dr. Henion's article has caused, and to meet the protestations which have been made. The standing of Dr. Henion, Mr. Warner and Dr. Lattimore in the community is beyond question, and the statements they make cannot for a moment be doubted. They conclusively show that Bright's disease of the kidneys is one of the most deceptive and dangerous of all diseases, that it is exceedingly common, alarmingly increasing, and that it can be cured.

Modern Bravery.

A writer in "Blackwood's Magazine" believes that the invention of long-range fighting has brought into the world a type of fortitude which has been hitherto totally unknown, (excepting in occasional isolated cases,) which is just as much a product of our century as railways or electric telegraphs, and which is as distinguishable from the animal courage required for sword-work as is prophecy for fortune-telling. Instead of dashing at the enemy in fierce excitement, instead of the hot emotion of savage struggle, instead of furious muscular exasperation, instead of the intensest development of combative facilities, our soldiers have now to exhibit their intrepidity by remaining placid, motionless, undisturbed amidst a hail of death and wounds. They have to stay quiet under constant fire, to let themselves be knocked to pieces, without the chance or even the possibility of doing anything to defend themselves in an eager, efficient, satisfactory form; the one solution open to them is to treat the other people in the same fashion, and to pelt impersonal missiles at them from afar. Not a man on either side has the pleasure of identifying the particular opponent who slaughters him. There is scarcely any of that individuality of carnage which is so contenting in a hand-to-hand fight.

And, worse than all, there is none of the output of effort, of the bitter strain, which necessarily accompanies the exhibition of brute hardihood. The bravery of to-day is a mere matter of contemplative process; there is no action, no movement, no tug about it. It principally consists in waiting obediently until you are hit by a stray shot. Troops do not like it. They are always wanting to get out of it, to rush ahead, to strike, to do something violent and comforting on their own behalf. They feel that it is absolutely unnatural to stand still to be killed, that it is totally anomalous to rest unaggressive under a tempest of ambient peril, that it is contrary to all the tendencies of humanity to make no vigorous attempt to ward off destruction; and yet that is precisely what they have learned to do. They may use shelter, if they can find it (it is no longer cowardly to hide) but they may not use action. In one of Raffet's caricatures, a regiment is halted in the middle of the river, with the water up to the men's necks. The colonel says to them: "My children, I forbid you to smoke, but I permit you to sit down;" and that is very much the situation in which European soldiers are placed in battle now; it is permitted them to be killed, but it is forbidden them to fight.

In Asia, it is true, there is still a chance of getting to close quarters, and of using the right arm—as a good many Englishmen who have been in Afghanistan can testify. But in modern fighting on the continent, the rule is that the foe is so far off that no fighting can reach him. The consequence is that our new shape of courage is based upon the suppression of direct effort. It has become a passive process, in which we endure, instead of acting. The old sword-daring was impetuous, emotional and intuitive. The new gun-courage is deliberate, logical and subjective. The one was material and substantial; the other is abstract and theoretical. They are as different from each other as credulity and faith, as astrology and astronomy, as dreams and thought.

Bird Telegraphy.

On a number of occasions, says a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, I have closely observed the woodcock's system of telegraphy. The bird's mandibles are furnished with extremely sensitive nerves, so arranged that when the points of the bill rest upon the ground the slightest sounds are conveyed to its brain.

Standing upon the water-saturated earth of a spouty bog, our bird utters a faint, keen cry, scarcely audible at two rods' distance, then immediately lets fall his head till the tip of his bill touches the ground, and listens attentively. If his mate hears him she replies, puts her bill on the ground, and listens in turn. So the love messages go back and forth as long as the birds have anything to say.

This sort of thing usually happens in the soft twilights, from May to the middle of August, though occasionally I have seen and heard it in the broad light of a summer day. In June, 1868, I made the following note:

"To-day sketched a woodcock in the listening attitude. Shall try to get further studies."

Five years later I succeeded in getting three more sketches, and in 1880 I got four more. Many of these and kindred sketches have been obtained at the end of indescribable care and labor.

The woodcock is so shy, so attentive, so sensitive, that the least sound will cause it to skulk and hide—a thing it does with even greater cunning and success than the quail. The only way in which I have ever been able to get near enough to the bird to sketch its natural attitudes, has been to crawl on the wet ground, through tangled weeds and shrubs, until I reached a hiding place on the border of its feeding range, and there patiently and silently watch for its coming. This I have done over and over again for days together before getting sight of the bird.

"THAT land ought to be used a cemetery," remarked a gentleman as the train glided by a field in which sand and stones were the principal productions. "Excellent idea," returned his friend; "nothing but the dead could ever be raised there."

RAILWAY DISASTER.

Terrible Accident on the Hudson River Railroad.

NEW YORK, Jan. 14.

The two rear cars of the Atlantic express, from the west, on the New York Central and Hudson River railroad, were crushed and jammed together by the Tarrytown local train near Spuyten Duyvil creek, last night. The wrecked cars were set on fire, and nine persons are known to have perished in the flames. It is believed that at least three others must have been burned.

State Senator Webster Wagner is supposed to have been crushed between two of his own drawing-room cars, and to have perished with the other victims. The Atlantic express left Albany at 3:30 p. m. nearly three-quarters of an hour behind time. The train was a heavy one, comprising thirteen cars. Next to the locomotive were two mail cars and a baggage car. Behind them were three ordinary passenger cars. Five Wagner drawing-room cars completed the train. They were the Red Jacket, Sharon, Vanderbilt, Minnehaha and Empire. The Empire was the rear car. At Greenbush, on the opposite side of the river from Albany, the Wagner drawing-room car Idlewild, from Troy, was coupled to the engine and became the last car of the train. The train was in charge of Conductor George Hanford, an old employe on the road. The conductor of the drawing-room cars was Mr. Taylor. Two stops were made—one at Hudson and the other at Poughkeepsie. From this last point the train began to make up some of the lost time. A speed of at least forty miles an hour was maintained until the Spuyten Duyvil Creek Station was reached. Here the engineer slowed down, and the train suddenly came to a stop about midway between that station and the Kingsbridge Station. Something, it was said by the train attendants, was the matter with the air brake. For some reason it failed to work. It was then a few minutes past 7 o'clock. The delay must have continued between five and ten minutes. Suddenly one short blast from a locomotive was heard, then the sound of grinding wheels from the rear grated harshly on the ear. The next instant there was a shock which shivered the Idlewild to splinters, drove its heavy frame like a telescope into the Empire, and completely wrecked that car in an instant. Two minutes later the Idlewild was on fire from the stove in the forward end, which had been thrown over by the shock. The flames leaped upon the splintered Empire, and that, too, was filled with fire and smoke almost before the occupants could escape. At least a dozen persons who were in the Idlewild were cut off from escape, caught by the jagged timbers, and these had to be slowly roasted alive. In the Empire were the following persons, all of whom managed to save themselves, though a number who were in the rear and had miraculous escapes from the swift advancing flames:—State Senator John C. Jacobs and John W. Browning, Assemblyman Alfred C. Chapin, Dr. J. W. Monk, of Brooklyn; J. Hampden Robb, Louis L. Vanamen, James J. Costello, John McManus and Edward C. Sheehy, of New York—the three last Tammany men; Commissioner of Police Sidney Nicholas, Mr. Edward Kearney, Nicholas J. Holahan, Commissioner of Emigration Ulrich, Mr. Edward Cahill, Charles Swan, Messrs. Joseph Doyle and Augustus Abel, two ladies, A. W. Lyman, correspondent of the New York Sun, and the Times' Albany correspondent.

The three Tammany Assemblymen had just left a compartment at the rear of the Empire, where they had been making merry, and were going toward the front of the car when the crash came, which splintered the very compartment they had just abandoned. Senator Webster Wagner had just passed them on his way to the Idlewild. He was not ten feet from the newspaper correspondent, and must have just stepped upon the rear platform of the Empire when the Idlewild shot forward and telescoped the Empire.

The first indication that the Empire's passengers had of danger was the single whistle of the locomotive of the local train, the Tarrytown express. The shock hurled them from their seats, and they were flung along the car floor. The swivel chairs, wrenched from their fastenings, were thrown after them and lay piled on top of the struggling occupants. A shower of glass came down from overhead, and the roof of the Empire was crushed in upon them by the weight of the Idlewild's roof, which seemed to have been lifted bodily, and shot forward upon that of the Empire. To add to the confusion the lights began to glimmer and the darkness to deepen. Nearly all the occupants found their way out through windows whose sashes had been shattered by the shock. The ladies were buried in a heap of debris, and were extracted without having received any severe bruises. Assemblyman Monk was pinned between timbers close to the roof. The roof was pried off, and he was with great difficulty released. He was completely prostrated by the shock to his nervous system, and had to be assisted to the Minnehaha. The correspondents had, perhaps, as narrow an escape as anybody. They were in the rear of the car, at the side of the car which was inside of the curve which the track makes at this point. A gentleman who sat opposite them, and was consequently on the outside of the curve, was buried beneath the debris and was only released from his perilous position by the efforts of his two neighbors across the aisle. The fire was creeping slowly toward him and the smoke was stifling, when he was pulled out and pushed through the window. Whether there were more passengers in one of the rear compartments of the Empire cannot be determined. As the last newspaper man climbed through the window he heard the screams of two women and the shouts of a man proceeding from the extreme rear of the Empire. Whether they were among that car's passengers, or whether they were in the forward end of the Idlewild, which was launched far into the Empire, is not known. With the exception of Assemblyman Monk, the occupants of the Empire before mentioned all escaped with slight cuts or bruises.

The noise of the collision was heard half a mile away, and the glare of the burning cars illuminated the country far around. A crowd of the residents of King Bridge and Spuyten Duyvil soon gathered. Axes were brought, and heroic endeavors to chop a hole in the side of the Idlewild were made. Nearly all of the Idlewild's passengers were caught in the timbers, and were unable to move hand or foot. Their shrieks were appalling. The flames were gaining headway, and there was neither hose, nor pails, nor water at hand to quench them. Water there was enough in the creek, not 200 feet distant from the doomed cars, but in the absence of vessels of some description it could not be obtained.

Finally some of the neighbors, whose dwellings fronted on the railroad track, furnished a few wooden pails. Valuable time had been lost, and the flames were now beyond control. The villagers continued to throw water through the windows nearest those spots where a human voice could be heard, until the heat drove them far beyond a point where the primitive fire-apparatus could be utilized.

A new danger was meanwhile threatening the thousand persons in the vicinity. The locomotive of the Tarrytown express was imbedded in the wreck of the Idlewild, its headlight a dozen feet within the car, a heavy head of steam was on, a red-hot fire was blazing in the fire-box, and there were grave doubts expressed by the engineer and firemen about the boiler resisting the tremendous pressure brought to bear upon it. Water to quench the fire was called for. Then great shovelfuls of snow were piled into the furnace. The water-carriers ceased for a brief space to empty their pails upon the burning cars, and dashed their contents into the furnace. The dying persons in the ruins had to be abandoned to grapple with this danger, which promised death to so many of the living. The furnace fires were finally quenched, and attention was once more turned to the two burning cars, whose more solid timbers had by this time been eaten away by the fierce flames. Ten minutes had elapsed since the accident. The last sound from the entombed passengers had died away. Nothing was heard but the crackle of the fire and the shouts of the villagers, half mad with excitement at the thought of human beings dying before their eyes, and they unable to afford them succor. Suddenly the idea of throwing snow on the burning cars was suggested by somebody in the throng. Hundreds of hands began to roll up big balls. They were passed over the fence to those who, braving the heat, was alongside the fiery piles and tossed them through the windows to be licked up by the flames. Ladders were procured and efforts made to punch holes through the car panels. Never did men work with more desperate energy than did these Spuyten Duyvil and Kingsbridge villagers. The dead bodies were reached one after another as the fire died away. The first was that of a portly woman, perhaps about 50 years of age. The next two bodies were those of a groom and bride who were on their wedding trip. The husband was Park Valentine, a young man of 28, who was in business with his father in the manufacturing of knit goods in Bennington, Vt. The maiden name of his young wife was Louise Gaylord. They were married in North Adams, Mass., Thursday night, and were on their way to New York. The burned and mutilated bodies were found very near together, and it is supposed that they met death simultaneously. Both were evidently killed by the first shock of the collision. Six more bodies were found, but so charred and burned that there was nothing about them positively to find their identity.

A GRAND DOMAIN.

The Corrected Figures, Showing the Area of the United States.

[Washington Telegram to the Chicago Times.]

Mr. Henry Gannett, the geographer of the tenth census, has just issued a bulletin giving the areas of the several States and Territories by counties. The information furnished is given with greater detail, and presumably with far greater accuracy, than in any of the previous census reports or other publications which have pretended to give it, and I have no doubt the general public, even that part of it which finds it convenient to get along without a great deal of really exact information, will find much of it interesting. There are few people, I take it, who have any very definite idea of the comparative size of the several States, Territories and districts of this glorious country of ours, and doubtless a good many tolerably well-informed persons will be surprised to see how small some of our big States really are when compared with our little Territories. For example, it may astonish some to learn that Idaho is nearly as large as New York and Pennsylvania, and that we haven't a Territory in the world, save one, that isn't bigger than New England. Ohio doesn't begin to be half as big as Wyoming, and Illinois would be lost in either Dakota or Montana, while the thirteen original States together are less than a third larger than Texas. For the purpose of showing the order in which the States and Territories stand, when judged by their size, I have transposed Mr. Gannett's table, with the following result:

States and Territories.	Gross Area.	Total Water Surface.	Total Land Surface.

The total area of the United States as reported by the census of 1850 was 2,980,959 square miles. The census of 1860 made it 3,026,494, and that of 1870, which included the newly-acquired territory of Alaska, some 577,390 square miles, gave it at 3,603,884. The figures for the States, and such of the Territories as still retained the same boundaries, are the same for 1870 as 1850, indicating that no new computation was made for either the eighth or ninth census, and a foot note appended to the table of areas in the report for 1870 states that the increase of the total area of 1860 over 1850 represents the territory acquired from Mexico, known as the Gadsden purchase. Another note says that "the land surface of the United States, 3,603,884 square miles, when increased by the water surface of the great lakes and rivers, brings the total area of the United States up to 4,000,000 square miles. But this, according to Mr. Gannett, who is a very careful calculator, is quite wide of the mark, since, without counting Alaska, he is only able to make it 3,025,600 square miles, which, minus the principal lakes, rivers and ponds, leaves us 2,970,000 square miles of fairly dry land. This ought to be enough to satisfy anybody, and Uncle Sam will probably be able to content himself with it, unless the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is abrogated, in which event the Lord only knows what he'll do.

But a careful study of these figures, more than anything else, will tend to convince one that there is indeed a world of country out West. In the ten prairie States, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Missouri, Kansas and Nebraska, there are 616,775 square miles, only 10,818 of which are "water lots." There are, therefore, 605,940 square miles of more or less productive soil in this region, on the cultivated portion of which, in the year 1880, according to the reckoning of Mr. Robert P. Porter, of the Census Bureau, there was raised 326,720,466 bushels of wheat, 1,288,265,107 bushels of corn, 70,167,962 pounds of tobacco, nearly 5,000,000 horses, more than 8,000,000 cattle, over 13,000,000 sheep, and about 16,000,000 hogs. The total production of cereals of all kinds in these ten States, according to the same responsible authority, was 1,907,848,928 bushels, or more than two-thirds of the product of the entire country. These same States produced in 1880 1,912,639 tons of iron and steel, worth in the aggregate $76,933,686.

The progress of manufacturing industries of all kinds in these ten States during the last thirty years, is almost beyond belief. In 1850 there were 3,162 manufacturing establishments of all kinds in Illinois; in 1880 there were 19,026, which turned out a manufactured product worth $339,274,100. Wisconsin in 1850 had 1,262 factories of all kinds, in 1880 she had 57,083, and turned out manufactured articles worth $104,239,240. The progress of manufactures in all these States has been equally rapid.

Saved by an Elephant.

An "old showman" tells the following exciting story of his experience when connected with a well-known menagerie during an engagement at Smithland, Kentucky. "After the exhibition was over," he says, "I passed into the menagerie to talk to the watchman. From some cause he was absent from his post, and I walked across the amphitheatre toward the elephant, to give him an apple, for we were the best of friends. He was one of the largest elephants I ever saw, and was as good-natured as he was large. I was about half across the ring when I heard a growl, and looking around, saw to my horror one of the lions out of his cage and approaching me in a crouching manner, ready for a spring. I thought of a thousand things in a moment, and among them I must have regretted perpetrating so many old, worn-out jokes at the performance that night. I had sufficient presence of mind to realize my dangerous situation, and to know that it required the utmost caution to extricate myself from it. One hasty motion on my part and I would be in the jaws of the monster. I felt that my only hope was the elephant, if I could reach him, but he was chained by the foot, and could not reach me.

"Nearer and nearer came the lion, waving his tail in a manner that meant business. If I turned my back, he would spring; if I took my eyes from him, I was lost. It was a terrible moment. I glided backwards swiftly as I dared. I had another fear. I feared stumbling backwards, and I knew if I did fall I would never rise, but where I fell I would make a meal for that lion.

"As I neared the elephant I saw that the lion understood my movements, and fearing he would be balked of his prey, he prepared to bring the matter to a crisis. I then saw that I had but one hope, and that was to rush with all my speed to the elephant. I think I must have jumped twenty feet when I turned, and I know the lion jumped thirty, but he just missed me. How I completed the race I do not know. I only know that the elephant's trunk was around my waist, and he was lifting me upon his head. I only knew that I was saved."

"FEMALE COMPLAINTS."

DR. R. V. PIERCE, Buffalo, N. Y.: Dear Sir—I was sick for six years, and could scarcely walk about the house. My breath was short and I suffered from pain in my breast and stomach all the time, also from palpitation and an internal fever, or burning sensation, and experienced frequent smothering or choking sensations. I also suffered from pain low down across my bowels and in my back, and was much reduced in flesh. I have used your "Golden Medical Discovery" and "Favorite Prescription," and feel that I am well. Very respectfully,

DELILAH B. MCMILLAN, Arlington, Ga.

AN INVENTOR proposes to make machine gear wheels of raw buffalo hide by cementing and pressing together as many layers as are required for the breadth of the wheel. The blanks thus prepared are cut to form the teeth in the usual manner with suitable tools. The advantages claimed are, smooth and noiseless action at very high speeds and greater durability without lubrication.

A GRAY hair was espied among the raven locks of a fair friend of ours a few days ago. "Oh, pray, pull it out," she exclaimed. "If I pull it out ten will come to the funeral," replied the lady who had made the unwelcome discovery. "Pluck it out, nevertheless," said the dark-haired damsel, "it's of no sort of consequence how many come to the funeral provided they all come in black."

Certain Knowledge.

We know whereof we affirm when we say that Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure has performed more wonderful cures than any medicine ever brought before the American public.

CENSUS figures show that Illinois is fast increasing in population, and will soon rank third in that respect in the list of States. Ohio is now the third State, New York and Pennsylvania being first and second respectively.

IN another column will be found the advertisement of ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM. We do not often speak of any proprietary medicine, but from what we have seen and heard of this great family medicine, we would say to those suffering with any throat or lung disease, to take it and be cured.

A TERRIBLE tornado in Minnesota was the cause of six cases of insanity, the result of shock.

MRS. TRULYRURAL has been in the city with her daughter to arrange for the vocal instruction of the young lady. She has not yet engaged a teacher, and is now in terrible state of perplexity. "The first professor said," she explained to Mr. T. on her return, "that Almira sings too much with her borax. If she keeps on she will get digestion on the lungs. He said he ought to try the abominable breathing and practice solfudgery. Then the next teacher told me that she ought to sing more with her diagram and not smother her voice in the sarcophagus. Then the next he poked a looking glass down her throat and said that the phalanx was too small and the typhoid bone and the polyglotis were in a bad way, and I never knew that Almira had so many things down her throat, and I'm afraid to let her sing any more for fear it'll kill the poor girl." And that was the end of "voice building" in the Trulyrural family.—Musical Herald.

A MAN is wiser for his learning, and the sooner he learns that the only proper way to cure a Cough or Cold is to use Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup, the better he is off.

At the beginning of his theatrical career, Mr. W. J. Florence, the popular comedian, played "general utility" at the Lyceum Theatre, New York, then under the management of Mr. John Brougham. Among the new pieces produced by that gentleman was one that created no little sensation at its first representation. It was called "A Row at the Lyceum Theatre, or Greenroom Secrets." Each member of the company appeared on the stage as himself or herself, wearing every-day costume, and the scene was the green-room of the theatre. The performance was exceedingly realistic, and went off capitally, until the entrance of Miss Buggins, a debutante, who—as previously arranged—after looking over the part allotted to her, objected to the "business," and insisted on having something more tragic. While she was making matters disagreeable on the stage, a stout middle-aged man, dressed in Quaker garb, rose in the centre of the stalls, and exclaimed:

"That woman looks for all the world like Clementina! Her voice is very like, the form is the same." After a pause, he added, "It is my wife!" and rushed toward the footlights, shouting, "Come off the stage, you miserable woman!"

The audience, at first amused, grew angry, and cries of "Put him out!" "Sit down!" "Police!" rang through the house. Up in the third tier, visible to all, was a red-shirted fireman, who loudly threatened he would give "Old Broadbrim" a sound thrashing if he attempted to lay a hand on the young woman, and was presently seen rushing down stairs to carry his threat into execution. The house was in an uproar; ladies tried to escape from the theatre, while gentlemen vainly endeavored to restore order. At last the irate husband clambered over the orchestra, the fireman close behind him, to be seized by a couple of police-officers, and dragged upon the stage. When there, they were made to face the house, and immediately the regulation semi-circle was formed, the rhymed "tag" spoken, and the curtain dropped, almost before the bewildered audience had time to recognize in the indignant husband, Mr. Brougham himself; in the recovered wife, Mrs. Brougham; in the red-shirted defender of the young woman, Mr. W. J. Florence; and to realize the fact that the whole scene had been previously rehearsed, and that they had been very cleverly hoaxed.

A Good Family Remedy.

STRICTLY PURE.

By its faithful use Consumption has been cured when other Remedies and Physicians have failed to effect a cure.

JEREMIAH WRIGHT, of Marion county, W. Va., writes us that his wife had PULMONARY CONSUMPTION, and was pronounced INCURABLE by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam ENTIRELY CURED HER. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

WM. C. DIGGES, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes, April 4th, 1881, that he wants us to know that the LUNG BALSAM HAS CURED HIS MOTHER OF CONSUMPTION after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured; he thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

DR. MEREDITH, Dentist, of Cincinnati, was thought to be in the last STAGES OF CONSUMPTION and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough, and that he was able to resume his practice.

WM. A. GRAHAM & CO., Wholesale Druggists, Zanesville, Ohio, writes us of the cure of Mathias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who has been afflicted with BRONCHITIS in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him, as it has many others, of BRONCHITIS.

Consumption, Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Croup,

C. S. MARTIN, Druggist, at Oakly, Ky., writes that the ladies think there is no remedy equal to Lung Balsam for CROUP and WHOOPING COUGH.

Catching a Sea Tartar.

[Pall Mall Gazette.]

A large whale has just been reading a short lesson on the old theme to the inhabitants of Walls Island, Orkney, and even to mankind at large. This whale in his gambols ran himself ashore, when the islanders turned out in a body with knives, pitchforks and every accessible instrument of attack, and after satisfying themselves by inflicting innumerable stabs that he was dead, proceeded, by the rising tide, to tow him with their boats into harbor. The whale, however, with a union of stoical endurance and diplomatic craft hitherto unrecognized in the species, had been biding his time, and no sooner regained his own element than he rushed out to sea, dragging the feet of screaming Orcadians behind him. To be hoist with your own petard is bad enough, but to be abducted by your own is worse, and the people of Walls, after three miles of an involuntary voyage, managed to cut the ropes and escape from the formidable sea tartar whom they had caught. From this adventurous incident the Walls Islanders and all who are willing to profit by the experience of others may learn how unsafe it is to contend with whales in their own waters or with men on their own ground, and, generosity apart, how imprudent it is to be cruel to the helpless, since there is no telling how formidable they may become when their opportunity arrives.

Destruction of Cork Forests.

Salvador Ceron, of Madrid has recently published a work which calls attention to the wanton destruction of cork forests in Spain. The cork oaks from which the cork is obtained, will live for nearly a century, if no more than a certain portion of the bark good for cork is removed each year, but of late years the demand for the bark of this tree for tanning purposes has been increasing, and the owners of forests, finding that this article pays them better than cork, and being eager for rapid gains, have cut down their trees and seriously reduced the area of the cork forests, for the land cleared by the cutting has, in most instances, been plowed, and new forests thus prevented from growing. There is no good excuse for cutting down the cork oaks in this manner, for there are plenty of other trees in Spain whose bark is suitable for tanning. As illustrating the extent of the destruction may be given the fact that while the province of Andalusia, twenty years ago, produced 95,000 tons of cork-wood, the production now has decreased to 47,000 tons. As the consumption of cork in the world is continually increasing, the serious depletion of the cork forests in Spain must constantly enhance the price of the article. The subject is exciting much attention in Spain, and probably the government will take measures to prevent the destruction of the cork forests.

Foot Prints in the Rocks.

Mr. A. K. Frost has left at this office a specimen that is both unique and interesting; in fact, we should consider it quite valuable were it our property. It is a piece of common sandstone, nine inches in length, and one and one-half inches thick. One face of this stone is the imprint of a human foot, six inches long. The impression made by the sole of the foot is simply perfect. The five toes are plainly imprinted, the indentation made by the heel and ball of the foot are plainly shown. It is the foot print probably of an Indian child, and was no doubt made in the soft sand during the long ago. The specimen was found on the mesa this side of the Garden of the Gods. It may be that one of the little maiden gods was out playing on a hill side in her bare feet, and was caught by Noah's flood, which is supposed to have caused the extinction of the family of gods which inhabited our garden, and that is the print of her foot made in the wet sand. The specimen can be seen at this office.—[Colorado Springs Mountaineer.

Albert Leu an, familiarly known "Chicago," was arrested last Saturday in this place for forgery. In the latter part of December he presented at the Farmers' National Bank a check for $50, drawn in favor of Prof. Brown, and the money was paid by the bank. Last Saturday he presented at the First National Bank another check on Mr. Brown, this time for $160. The suspicions of the cashier were aroused, and the matter was referred to Mr. Brown, who pronounced the check a forgery, whereupon Mr. Leuman was arrested, and, upon preliminary examination bound over for trial; failing to give bond for his appearance he was placed in jail. Leuman is a young man about 17 years of age, and has been at the Normal for several months. His mother is reported to be a poor woman, and resides in Chicago. He has been a terror to the good people of College Hill for some time, and has been known to commit some very annoying acts during the time he has been in the city.—Porter County Vidette.

"I rise for information," said a consumptive member of a legislative body "Take Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup and stop coughing," was the reply. 25 and 50 cents a bottle.

The Meat Mines of Siberia.

It has often been stated that the inhabitants of Polar Siberia feed their dogs on mammoth meat, preserved in nature's ice house, and sliced off at the convenience of the dogs. How these tropical animals come to be so near the pole is an unsolved problem of the earth's history. There are various theories intended to explain the conditions, but none of them are quite convincing. The most reasonable one is that countless ages ago there must have been a sudden change of temperature at the poles from torrid to frigid. The animals were caught out of their latitude, frozen and buried in ice. A recent traveller in Siberia relates that, happening to drive in a sledge along the base of one of the monstrous ice-cliffs that overhang the estuary of the river Lena, he came upon a pack of wolves devouring the frozen flesh of a mammoth. The breaking away of a portion of the cliff had exposed the monster pile of preserved meat, and at the hands of nature the wolves were helping themselves. So nature brings recompense for her freaks, and takes care of her own. The meat mines of Siberia have not been developed, and no one knows what riches they may contain, or how they may yet be utilized in the economy of the world. The search may result in the delicacy of canned mammoth, warranted fresh from Siberia.—[English Paper.

Since she has got well everyone about here is taking it."—[See Adv.

How to Distinguish Small-Pox.

Whenever you see pimples depressed in the center you may take that as a sign of small-pox. Small-pox postules appear first on the face, then on the neck and hands, and afterward on the body. At first they are the size and have the solidity of small shot, but a lay-man would not be able to judge of them until on and after the fourth day, when they become depressed in the center and surrounded by a circle of pink that turns a dark crimson. These pimples are often so thick that they run together. There is an odor accompanying the disease that once noticed cannot be forgotten.—Cincinnati Times Star.

Holloway' Pills.

Never dispair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispels doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

Notice of Insolvency.

In the matter of the estate of William Wyatt deceased.—In the DeKalb circuit court. Estate No. 93.

Notice is hereby given, that upon petition filed in said court by Elmore Y. Wyatt of said estate, setting up the insufficiency of the estate of said decedent to pay the debts and liabilities thereof, the judge of said court did, on the 4th day of January, 1882, find said estate to be probably insolvent, and order the same to be settled accordingly. The creditors of said estate are therefore hereby notified of such insolvency, and required to file their claims against said estate for allowance, on or before the February term, 1882, of said court.

Witness, the clerk and seal of said court, at Auburn, Indiana, this 12th day of January 1882. JOHN W. BAXTER, Clerk. 3-3w.

NOTICE is hereby given, that I will vaccinate all children within the corporated limits of the town of Auburn, whose circumstances are such that they are really not able to procure vaccination for themselves. This notice will continue in effect until the 15th of February next. By order of Board of Health.

J. J. LITTLEFIELD, Secretary of town Board of Health.
Auburn, Ind., Jan. 25, 1882.

Neighborhood Notes.

—Mr. John Goodyer says that a poultice of grated carrot applied to the abdomen will quickly relieve the hardest case of constipation.—Porter county Vidette.

—Our community was shocked last week, on being apprised of the suicide of Charles H. Gilbert, residing six miles east of town, who, from the excessive use of intoxicating liquors and domestic troubles took a heavy dose of morphine which soon caused death.—LaGrange Democrat.

—The road-bed for the C. W. & M. railway, which is to be extended to Benton Harbor on Lake Michigan, was surveyed, and work is to be begun at an early day. This will give Warsaw and Kosciusko county people a route to the great lakes, that cannot but be very beneficial to everybody.—Indianism.

—Mr. John Soub showed us a copy of the Bible that was printed in the German language in 1744, and brought to this country by his father in 1816. The book has stood the wear and tear of nearly a century and a half in a manner that proves the binding to have been done in a manner superior to that of our day.—Butler Record.

—A ninety-seven pound Ligonier girl has a beau that tips the beam at 210. She keeps him in attendance every night up to 12 o'clock, seated comfortably in an arm chair. She explained to a companion under the seal of secrecy, that beneath the cushion she kept her autumn leaves in a book, and as soon as they were sufficiently pressed, she would give him the mitten.—Kendallville Review.

—A short time ago Rev. John Huffman had a fine horse and buggy stolen from the stable of a friend near Brunersburg, this county. The thief had entered several stables along the road and took a horse belonging to Mr. Ashberger, but when he came to Mr. Huffman's, knowing it was the best horse, he released the first stolen, hitched Huffman's to his buggy and drove towards Liepsic, O.—Hicksville News.

—A short time ago a German and his three daughters, the eldest 17, the next 10, and the third 7 years of age, arrived here from Arkansas, having walked the entire distance. They rented a house south of the railroad, purchased some furniture, and with a box of bedclothing, which subsequently arrived on a train, they have gone to housekeeping with the intention of remaining. The man's wife started with him but died off the way.—Elkhart Review.

—At last the telephone line between Goshen and Elkhart has been completed, and the Goshen branch will start out with forty-five subscribers. This line has been built by the Midland Telephone company, and will be under the management of C. M. Proctor, of Elkhart. The central office in Goshen is located in hubbell's Block. We had a talk through the telephone last Monday evening with a gentleman in Elkhart, and it seemed as though he was standing right by us, so distinct and clear was it.—Goshen Times.

—The law requiring owners of dogs to secure tags for them from the township trustee went in force on the first of January, and all dogs must be tagged and registered by the first of April. The tags are brass, and just the size of a silver quarter. One side is the state seal and above it Dog Tax, 1882. On the reverse is the number and the makers of the tags, B. W. Smith & Co., LaFayette. The tags cost nothing. The party owning a male dog pays $1 tax, and a female dog $2 tax and the trustee gives the tag as a receipt and also a ring to affix it to the dog's collar.—South Bend Tribune.

—A farmer's house near South Bend was burglarized by Edgar Christie, the hired man of the farmer. Christie was accused of the crime by the sheriff, and at once confessed. He was arrested, presented to circuit court on information, pleaded guilty and sentenced to two years in the penitentiary, all inside of an hour and a half, and on the day of the crime. This is swift justice, and worthy of imitation; but one mitigating circumstance is, that the court expired that day by limitation, and the case being so plain, there was no excuse whatever for postponing action to the next term of court.—Goshen Times.

—The C. W. & M. railway extension is rapidly approaching completion. The right-of-way has been procured along the entire route, except a short piece at Niles, which will undoubtedly be adjusted by the time the contractor is ready to work on it. The bridge across the river at Elkhart is rapidly going up, and the cut under the main line has been made. From Elkhart, the road will be built along the northeast side of the Lake Shore to this city. No difficulties have been encountered except at our cemetery, which is approached verp closely by the Lake Shore road; and here the new road had to condemn a part of the right-of-way of the Lake Shore, and the bank of the cemetery will have to be walled up. The weather permitting, it will not take long to build the bed from here to Elkhart.—Goshen Times.

—The Plymouth Democrat says:—"Drunkenness is bad at best, but when a husband becomes such a slave to strong drink as to make his wife almost a maniac, it is time that a stop was put to it. We heard of the wife of a husband who was in the habit of becoming intoxicated to such an extent that it became unendurable, who recently left her home in a neighboring town barefooted with the avowed intention of committing suicide by drowning herself in a body of water near by. When she thought of her little children, she abandoned her intention and started barefoot and alone at the dead hour of night, and walked a distance of sixteen miles to the home of some of her friends. Husbands who drink to excess little know the heartaches they cause their families and friends, and the only wonder is that more wives do not kill themselves than do.

A few years ago there was considerable excitement in the northern portion of the county over the reported drowning of a man named Elko, in Hog lake. The lake was dragged for nearly a week, and finally divers from Toledo searched for the body but never found it. Elko either sank down in the quicksand bottom, or as has been alleged by some, left the country, throwing some articles of clothing on the shore to give the people the idea that he had found a watery grave. Mrs. Elko soon gave up all hope of seeing her spouse again, and after a time gave her hand and heart to Wesley Furlong, living near Wilder's Mills, in Gilead township, just over the line in Michigan. A year ago last summer, while Mr. Furlong was engaged in threshing, he felt an attack of vertigo coming on, so climbed down from the stack, where he was pitching bundles, to the platform of the threshing machine. In trying to save himself from falling to the ground, he threw out one of his hands so that it was caught by the cylinder and terribly lacerated, rendering amputation necessary, the operation being performed by Dr. Bennett, of Orland. Last Wednesday morning Mr. Furlong took his gun, with the intention of going out rabbit hunting. As he was leaving the house he caught the weapon on a projecting window casing in such a manner that it was discharged, the shot entering the side of his head and face, instantly killing him. Those who saw the body say the head was literally blown to pieces. It would seem as though Mrs. Furlong has had more than her share of trouble.—Angola Republican.

Mr. Ely Paar and Miss Annie Nussdorfer were united in bonds of holy matrimony on Thursday, the 19th inst. They will soon leave for Michigan, intending to make it their future home.

IT SEEMS IMPOSSIBLE that a remedy made of such common, simple plants as Hops, Buchu, Mandrake, Dandelion, etc., should make so many and such great cures as Hop Bitters do; but when old and young, rich and poor, pastor and doctor, lawyer and editor, all testify to having been cured by them, you must believe and try them yourself, and doubt no longer. 5-2w.

—From the personal column of a New York paper, we learn that a great many women are traveling around lecturing this season. We know a women who lectures without traveling around. We had the sad pleasure of listening to one of her strongest efforts a few nights ago, on our return (1 P. M.) from the theatre.—[Texas Siftings.

Indian Relics in Maine.

One of the most interesting localities and one of the latest unearthed in this vicinity is the Indian place of execution or torture on Fort Island at the narrows, near the mouth of Damariscotta river. A few days ago, while Postmaster Gamage and Mr. Phelps were hunting for relics at the above named place, they discovered, among numerous fish spears, needles and arrowheads the remains of five skeletons, apparently Indians—the skull showing a very low order of intellect—one skull of which they were able to get out nearly perfect, which is now in the possession of Dr. Chapman. They found five underjaws, one of them nearly perfect, but none of them would fit the skulls. One skull was very large; they judged it to be nearly twice the size of the average, but so far decayed that with the utmost care it could not be moved from the place where it lay. These skeletons did not lie in any regular order, but appeared to have been burned at the stake, as a space of six feet square or more was covered with ashes, charcoal and rocks that had been exposed to fire. The skulls were nearly face down and but few other bones could be removed whole. The appearance indicated that there had been numerous victims burned at different times, and the whole was covered with an accumulation of earth and shells in four distinct layers one foot in depth. They also found pottery, the skulls of deer and jaws of bears, and one large stag or elk horn. There is no doubt but that dilligent search will reveal further evidence of a place of savage torture.—[Damariscotta, Me., Herald.

Guard Against Disease.

If you find yourself getting bilious, head heavy, mouth foul, eyes yellow, kidneys disordered, symptoms of piles tormenting you, take at once a few doses of Kidney-Wort. It is nature's great assistant. Use it as an advance guard—don't wait to get down sick. See large advertisement.

—A boy who is polite to his father and mother is likely to be polite to every one else. A boy lacking politeness to his parents may have the semblance of courtesy in society, but is never truly polite in spirit, and is in danger, as he becomes familiar, of betraying his real want of courtesy. We are all in danger of living too much for the outside world, for the impression which we make in society, coveting the good opinions of those who are in a sense a part of ourselves, and who will continue to sustain and be interested in us, notwithstanding these defects of deportment and character. We say to every boy and to every girl, cultivate the habits of courtesy and propriety at home—in the sitting room and the kitchen, as well as in the parlor—and you will be sure in other places to deport yourself in a becoming and attractive manner. When one has a graceful demeanor, it is a satisfaction to know these are not put on, but that they belong to the character, and are manifest at all times and under all circumstances.

A Kitten Freak in Georgia.

A most wonderful freak of nature and living curiosity may be seen at the home of Mr. Dennis Brosnan, in this city. The family cat gave birth to four kittens which are all joined together, Siamese twin fashion. Each kitten is perfectly formed, but they stand abreast, and are joined together by a substantial artery or a double skin extending from the side of one to the other. There are two males and two females in this wonderful family of kittens, and they are as lively as kittens of their age can be. Won't it be fun when they get large enough for business and try to dive into the same rat hole?

AT Hampton, Pa., while William Cork was dying of small-pox, his wife placed a lighted candle in his hands and knelt beside the bed in prayer. She instantly succumbed to exhaustion, the bedding was set on fire, and she and her child were overcome by smoke. The neighbors saw the situation, but only one dared to enter the house. The flesh was burned from Cork's bones, and his wife and daughter will not recover.

Another of the suspected ones, named William Zeck, was made ready for execution, when he confessed that Beggs was killed for a silver dollar, and gave the names of those concerned. He was then taken back to jail.

AT a Joliet (Ill.) stone quarry a blast failed to explode, so that the hole had to be tamped, at which John and Charles Zossen and William Henline were put to work. IMPORTANT tidings relative to the crew of the Jeannette are given in a dispatch from Engineer Melville, at Irkutsk, to the United States Secretary of the Navy. It seems that Melville has returned to the Arctic ocean, and that his search has been rewarded by the discovery of the log-books, instruments and four records left by Lieut. De Long. He had obtained no tidings of the fate of that portion of the Jeannette's crew which left the wreck in the second cutter, in command of Lieut. Chipp. The Cossack commandant at Irkutsk, by direction of Gen. Tschirnieff, will continue the search during the winter. Melville requests orders to remain with two men and renew the search in March.

THE GUITEAU TRIAL.

FORTY-NINTH DAY.

Scoville resumed his argument, and produced a diagram showing a section of the prisoner's head. Taking up the diagram of the assassin's head, offered in evidence by Dr. Hamilton, Scoville said: "I propose to show you that Dr. Kempster lied when he told you that this diagram was a correct representation of the shape of Guiteau's head. He attempted to convince you that Guiteau had an unusually symmetrical head, and I propose to show you that his evidence in this respect was absolutely false."

Scoville contended that Dr. Gray's tables of homicides by insane persons were prepared for this case and do not correspond with tables for the same years in Gray's official reports. In reading the account of one case of homicide Scoville said: "Had the District Attorney been there he would have said, probably, put him on trial for murder and hang him. This is a case of devilish depravity."

Guiteau shouted exultingly: "Corkhill is an authority on the devil. Dr. Gray is a man with a big mouth. That's the way I mark him."

Scoville discussed at some length the demoralizing influence of the scaffold, and expressed the opinion that crime would be diminished by the abolition of capital punishment. He then proceeded to anticipate the argument of Judge Porter, and to point out to the jury the fallacy of the arguments which he predicted Judge Porter would advance to support the theory of the prosecution and to secure the hanging of Guiteau. In conclusion he said:

"It has often been said that our jury trials are a farce, and I have in my practice frequently heard it said that the jury system ought to be abolished, because juries make a mistake, because they are influenced by the eloquence of advocates, because they are influenced, not by justice, not by evidence, but by the last address. But, gentlemen, I thank God that there was a time when my English ancestors stood up against wrong and injustice, and wrested from a despot the right of trial by jury, and I have never yet seen the time when I would wish to see that right abolished. I feel more secure and more safe in this mode of administering justice than in any other. So long as juries are honest it does not require that you should have read Kent or Blackstone. It requires that you should have honest hearts and clear heads, and, above all, that you should be fearless to find for the right, regardless of what may come, regardless of whether your fellow-man may approve it or not. This is what I shall expect of you, gentlemen, and I believe you will do it. I leave the case with you, gentlemen, thanking you for your kind attention."

As Guiteau was being taken out of the court-room he stopped to speak to Scoville, when Bailiff Tall attempted to move him along. Guiteau turned angrily, and said to Tall: "Behave yourself."

"Come, come," said Tall, impatiently, trying to push the prisoner.

"Let me alone!" shouted Guiteau. "Mind your own business."

Tall having applied some "pressure" to Guiteau, the latter, with his manacled hands, struck the officer in the breast, when he was at once seized by the officers and turned out of the court-room.

FIFTIETH DAY.

The assassin was given the fiftieth day of his trial to address the jury. He said:

"The prosecution pretend that I am a wicked man, Mr. Scoville and the rest think I am a lunatic, and I presume you think I am. I certainly was a lunatic July 2, when I fired on the President and the American people generally, and I presume you think I was. Can you imagine anything more insane than my going to that depot and shooting the President of the United States? You are here to say whether I was sane or insane at the moment I fired that shot. You have nothing to do with my condition before or since that shot was fired. You must say by your verdict sane or insane at the moment the shot was fired. If you have any doubt of my sanity at the moment you must give me the benefit of the doubt and acquit—that is, if you have any doubt whether I fired that shot as the agent of the Deity. If I fired it on my own account I was sane; if I fired it, supposing myself to be the agent of the Deity, I was insane, and you must acquit."

With this introduction the prisoner took up a newspaper and proceeded to read to the jury his published speech. His manner to the casual observer seemed completely self-possessed as usual, but behind the ostentatious affectation of composure was intense feeling, which was only held in control through his undoubted strength of will. His excitement was betrayed by a slight hectic spot, high upon each cheek, of his usually colorless face, and by the unusual deliberation with which he began and for some time continued to speak. Whether this excitement was from merely superficial effect upon his emotions, naturally incident to the occasion, or whether it proceeded from a deeper and more overpowering influence, the true realization of his position, an almost-convicted murderer pleading for his life, it were difficult to divine. Whatever the original character of feeling, it finally gained the ascendency over his powers of control, and as he reached that point in his speech—"I have always served the Lord, and whether I live or die"—he broke down completely, stopped, tried to choke down the rising lump in his throat, but found it impossible to keep back a genuine sob. Taking out his handkerchief, he buried his face in it for a few seconds, wiped his eyes, and with a determined effort started on again. He seemed to recover his composure so quickly that some believed the whole effort was manufactured. His sister, Mrs. Scoville, however, apparently thought otherwise. She was deeply affected, and wept and sobbed bitterly for some minutes. After this incident Guiteau continued to read, occasionally adding brief comments upon the text. As he proceeded with his reading all appearance of nervousness gradually wore off, and, with the utmost composure and an unction that bordered upon the ludicrous, the prisoner read on with an attempt at every conceivable form of oratorical and dramatic effect. His description of the taking off of the President was given with striking effect. At this time he closed his eyes or turned them heavenward, waved his body back and forth, sank his voice to a whisper or raised it to a high treble. At times the intensity of his utterances seemed to react upon himself, but the effect was but transitory, and with the exception of one instance there was no indication of breaking down. At frequent intervals he paused to emphasize some sentence or sentiment by repeating it or commenting upon it. At one time, pausing, he leaned toward the jury and, emphasizing with his head and hands, said, with an attempt at great solemnity of utterance:

"I tell you, gentlemen, just as sure as there is a God in heaven, if you harm a hair of my head this nation will go down in blood. You can put my body in the grave, but there will be a day of reckoning."

"The jury may put my body in the ground, but my soul will go marching on. The slaveholders put John Brown's body in the ground, but his soul goes marching on."

FIFTY-FIRST DAY.

The assassin began proceedings by announcing the receipt of several hundred letters, many of them tender missives from ladies. He then informed the audience that he did not think it proper that he should accept a Cabinet office from President Arthur, and that he would stop Judge Porter should he attempt to mislead the jury.

Judge Porter then commenced the closing argument to the jury for the prosecution. He opened with the remark that thus far the trial had practically been conducted by the prisoner and Mr. Scoville, and every one had been denounced at their will. He proceeded to sketch the career of the assassin as a beggar, a hypocrite and a scoundrel, and to depict the horrors of his crime.

As Judge Porter proceeded with a resistless torrent of denunciation and invective, the prisoner occasionally called out: "That's a lie!" "That's absolutely false;" or, "That ain't so." Passing in review the principal events of the prisoner's life, Judge Porter showed up in all its hideous deformity the infamous bent of his nature. Alluding to his dispute with his brother, John W. Guiteau, in Boston, where he struck the latter in the face, Judge Porter said this was the first and last time this coward ever struck any one a blow in the face. His coward hand always struck from behind. After showing who and what was the murderer, Judge Porter next described his victim, paying a glowing tribute to the character and services of the lamented President, and pronouncing a most touching eulogy, as it were, on his memory. The claims of the prisoner to be a praying man were considered, and the hollow mockery of the claim shown. Guiteau angrily shouted:

"I pray every night and morning and before every meal. If you did the same you would be a better man. You wouldn't be here looking for blood-money."

"The prisoner says he prayed for six weeks. Why, if he had made up his mind unalterably to murder the President on the 1st of June," said Judge Porter, "did he still continue to pray down to the very act of murder?"

Guiteau—"I prayed to see if the Lord wouldn't let me off from killing him."

"What was he praying for?" continued Judge Porter. "The man who claimed to have received divine inspiration himself prepares his defense in advance for an act to do which he was divinely inspired. The believer in inspiration, he would himself alter the inspired book and substitute for it a book of his own. That he did not shoot the President on the first occasion," said Judge Porter, "was due to his coward heart. Had he done it on that occasion he would have been torn to pieces, and he knew it. On this occasion the President was surrounded by his Cabinet and his friends. His son, not yet strong, but who would have been urged at such a time with a God-given strength to defend his father, was also by his side, and the assassin's craven heart failed him and he said, 'Not yet; at some other time.'"

With graphic picturing Judge Porter related the dogging of the President's footsteps to the little church, the incidents or accidents on each occasion which baffled him. President Garfield's visit to Secretary Blaine's house, dogged by the assassin, was vividly portrayed.

In the course of his speech Judge Porter adverted to the constant interruptions of the prisoner, his false claims of sympathy, and that the press was with him, and said in contradiction:

"I have yet to see a single American newspaper that has one word to say in his defense."

Scoville vainly strove to get the ear of the court, protesting that Judge Porter was exceeding the rules of the court by such statements. At length Judge Porter paused, and Scoville demanded that he be allowed to make similar statements in reply.

Judge Porter attempted to go on, but Scoville, reinforced by the clamor of the prisoner, succeeded in getting the floor, when, with much excitement, he demanded that his rights, and he claimed that he had rights, should be respected. He insisted that Judge Porter had no right to state what the newspapers said or what they didn't say, and he desired an exception duly noted.

Col. Corkhill insisted that counsel had no right to object. The prisoner had been allowed to state what he had received in the way of letters. He had been permitted to read them, to read extracts from papers and to make all sorts of statements as to what the American people and press were saying of him. Judge Porter was simply contradicting these statements.

Judge Cox intimated that the prisoner was not allowed to do as charged, but could not be restrained from doing so.

Scoville—"Well, can't Judge Porter be restrained?"

The Judge ruled that the speaker might contradict assertions of the kind made by the prisoner.

Judge Porter then read from printed evidence several of the more noted examples of this effort on the part of the prisoner to deceive the jury.

FIFTY-SECOND DAY.

As Judge Porter rose to resume his address, the assassin shouted out that two cranks had been hanging around the court-room, and if they undertake to harm him they will be shot down. Judge Porter opened by the assertion that the whole defense has been an imposture. When he spoke of the destruction of the notes of Stenographer Bailey, Mr. Scoville demanded to be heard, and Mr. Reed expressed the opinion that the court should arrest Judge Porter for contempt. Allusion having been made to President Arthur, Guiteau interrupted with the boast that his inspiration placed Arthur in the White House, adding, "And don't you forget it, Judge Porter." Replying to this taunt from the prisoner, Judge Porter described him as slippery as an orange peel, as venomous as a rattlesnake, and, speaking of the act of the murder, said this was a rattlesnake without a rattle, but not without fangs.

Judge Porter pointed out the cunning, the duplicity, the acting of the prisoner since the beginning of the trial. Referring to the oft-repeated assertion that he had sent Garfield prepared to meet his God, and he (Guiteau), too, was ready to die if God willed it, Judge Porter, with deliberate emphasis, said: "I do not believe, in all this assemblage, there is one soul that contemplates with such abject terror the possibility of facing his Maker as does this brazen murderer."

Guiteau whirled around with the ferocity of a wild beast and fairly yelled: "That's a miserable lie and you know it, Porter, and you are an infernal scoundrel! I hope God Almighty will send for you soon, both you and Corkhill. Such a miserable, sneaking whine as that is!"

"The law," said Judge Porter, "as it bears upon this case, is the Supreme Court, and you are but simply God-made men, under the obligation of a solemn oath to bring in your verdict under the law and facts." Summing up the question presented by the case upon which they were soon to be called upon to pass, Judge Porter said: "The first question for you to consider is: Was the prisoner insane on the 2d of July? If he was not, the case is at an end, and your sworn duty is ended. Second, if you reach that, if he was insane on that day, was he insane to that degree that on the 2d of July he did not know that murder was morally and legally wrong? If he was not insane to that degree, you are bound under your oaths to convict him. Third, if in utter disregard of his confession under oath you shall find that he actually and honestly believed that God had commanded him to kill President Garfield, and that he was under that delusion, unless you find the further fact that the delusion disabled him from knowing such act was morally and legally wrong, you are bound by your oaths to convict him. Fourth, if you find such delusion did not exist; that God commanded him to do the act, and that the delusion was the sole product of insanity, then, and then only, you can acquit him—when you find he was unable to control his own will—and you must remember that under oath he has sworn he was able to control it, for he said had Mrs. Garfield been with him at the depot on the 2d of July I would not have shot him. Fifth, if you find that even though he was partially insane it resulted from his own malignity, his own depravity; yet still you are bound, under the instructions of the court, to convict him. Sixth, if upon the whole case you have no reasonable doubt whether he was partially or wholly insane, if you believe that he knew his act was legally and morally wrong, you are, under your oaths, bound to convict him. The law is founded upon reason, and it must not be said that an American jury shall override law and establish a principle which will let murder and rape and arson run riot through the land.

FIFTY-THIRD AND LAST DAY.

As usual, Guiteau opened proceedings in court by announcing: "My sister has been doing some silly talk in Chicago. She means well; but she's no lawyer." Judge Porter immediately resumed his argument.

Reading from the evidence of J. W. Guiteau and commenting upon it, Judge Porter said of the prisoner: "He has two faces."

Guiteau—"How many have you got?"

Judge Porter—"He has two faces—one showing the sanctity of a pharisee, and the other the hideous grin of the fiend that possesses him."

As he continued to read from J. W. Guiteau's testimony, relative to his last interview with the prisoner, the latter continually interrupted with such comments as: "What I say is always true, Judge Porter. What you say is generally false." "I never said so." "That is absolutely false."

Proceeding, Judge Porter contrasted the life, conduct and deceitful practices of the prisoner with the Apostle Paul, in the light of the prisoner's assumption that he, like Paul, was honestly engaged in doing the Lord's work. Paul never palmed off brass watches for gold.

"Neither did I," spoke Guiteau.

"Oh, you are a blood man," retaliated Guiteau. "You belong to the Judas tribe."

The picture drawn by Judge Porter was anything but a lovely one, and provoked the prisoner to the most abusive retorts.

"You're a liar, and you know it; and I tell you so to your face, Judge Porter!" he called out.

As Judge Porter continued his arraignment of the prisoner, Guiteau winced and nervously twisted in his seat, and finally drowned the voice of Judge Porter, who gave way to his clamor. In savage tones he shouted: "A saint from heaven couldn't stand the abuse of that man Porter, and I won't stand it. I will relieve my mind. The idea of this man trying to make me out a fighting man, a man of bad character, and all that. It's a lie, and he knows it. He's a liar, and I'll call him so."

The interruptions of the prisoner grew in violence and frequency till, reinforced by an objection of Scoville, the clamor and din for the moment resembled a small Babel. Scoville finally made himself heard and desired an exception noted to the statement of the construction put on the evidence by Judge Porter. A sharp discussion ensued, during which the prisoner made himself heard from the dock, shouting: "It's an outrage for that man to be allowed to speak. He ought to be under arrest for his insolence. It has been nothing but one stream of abuse from him all morning. It's enough to provoke a saint from heaven. It's a disgrace upon a court of justice."

Judge Porter compared the prisoner to Wilkes Booth, and showed the latter to be almost a patriot compared with the cowardly assassin now on trial. "For Booth was actuated by a mistaken motive of patriotism, and was a man of manhood and manliness. But this sneaking, cowardly wretch, who could plan for his victim's death and his own safety at the same time, murdered his man for revenge and for notoriety."

Guiteau—"I shot my man in broad daylight and don't you forget it, Porter."

Pressing the assertion that Guiteau was actuated by revenge and a desire for notoriety, Judge Porter compared him to a noted criminal in Europe. "I don't recall his name," said Judge Porter, "but he said: 'I am the ugliest man in Europe.' 'I would rather be the ugliest man in Europe and have notoriety than remain in the ranks of mediocrity.'"

For the next half hour there was one continual stream of interruptions and abuse from the prisoner. A score of times he denounced Judge Porter as a liar, varying the expressions as adjectives suggested themselves. His vindictive disposition showed itself as never before, and for once his cunning was merged into his angry spite, and, as Judge Porter piled up an Ossa of invectives upon the Pelion of denunciation, the prisoner unwittingly emphasized and corroborated the diagnosis of depravity and wicked-heartedness which counsel was, with such telling effect, pronouncing upon him.

"You know that's all an absolute, desperate, wicked, devilish lie," finally shouted Guiteau, stammering with rage.

Judge Porter, in closing, said: "Gentlemen, the time has come when I must close. The Government has presented its case before you, and we have endeavored to discharge our duty to the best of our ability. His Honor has endeavored to discharge his. I know you will be faithful to your oaths and discharge yours. So discharge it that, by your action, at least, political assassination shall find no sanction to make it a precedent hereafter. He who has ordained that human life shall be shielded by human law from human crime presides over your deliberations, and the verdict which shall be given or withheld to-day will be recorded where we all have to appear. I trust that the verdict will be prompt, that it will represent the majesty of the law, your integrity and the honor of the country; and that this trial, which has so deeply interested all the nations of the earth, may result in a warning (to reach all lands) that political murder shall not be used as a means of promoting party ends or political revolutions. I trust also the time shall come in consequence of the attention that shall be called to the considerations growing out of this trial when, by an international arrangement between the various Governments, the law shall be so strengthened that political assassins shall find no refuge on the face of the earth."

Judge Cox then proceeded to charge the jury. He instructed them to pay no heed to the statements made by the prisoner as to public sentiment in his case, the only question being that of guilt or innocence. The jury spent thirty minutes in reaching a verdict of guilty. The assassin passed the time in a small waiting-room, and predicted his acquittal. When brought back to the dock he showed unusual pallor, but no nervousness. When the verdict was announced, he cried out: "My blood will be upon the heads of that jury, and don't you forget it." The audience shouted itself hoarse in approval of the conviction. Mr. Scoville at once gave notice of a motion for a new trial. Guiteau said: "God will avenge this outrage." Judge Cox paid the highest compliment to the jury. When the assassin was put in the van the crowd hooted until he was out of sight.

Juror Longley's Story.

Longley, the fourth juror impaneled, in telling the story of the verdict, said: "We were not long in getting our verdict ready. We were fifty minutes absent from the court-room, and half an hour of that time was taken up in reading the indictment. We took two ballots. On the first we stood eleven for conviction and one blank. That was cast by the German, who was a little doubtful on one point, and wanted to be instructed. He didn't understand the instructions as to the question of insanity thoroughly. It only took a moment to satisfy him, and then, when a ballot was taken, we were unanimous for conviction." He was asked if he had heard that the public were for a time fearful that one of the jurors was going to hang the jury. He said: "Yes, I have heard that since I left the court-room. We thought ourselves, for a while, that one man would stand out against all the others, but it was only for a time. We didn't express any opinions to each other during the time, but I think we all knew pretty well what the general feeling was." Being asked to give some idea as to how the events of the trial impressed the jury, particularly the interruptions of Guiteau and the speeches, he said: "It was all very tedious. There was so much that was gone over and over again. The lawyers kept telling us, day after day, of things we were tired of hearing. We didn't mind Guiteau's interruptions, and we understood that Judge Cox was giving him liberty so as not to have another trial. As to the speeches, I think Judge Porter's impressed the jury the most, but then none of the lawyers' speeches had any influence with us. We made up our minds from the evidence and from the instructions. We listened to Scoville with interest. He did very well, and stood up for Guiteau manfully; but he couldn't make anything out of the case. Judge Cox's instructions were clear and to the point. There was no mistaking them." Longley was asked what his personal opinion of Guiteau was. He replied: "I think he is a fanatic, but he is morally responsible for his actions. I have known lots of people who were fanatics, and they imagined all sorts of strange things. But they knew when they were doing what was wrong, and were accountable for it. We heard a great deal about moral depravity during the trial and about illusions. I have met some wicked people, and they have had all sorts of illusions; but if they killed a man I would have held them responsible. Guiteau may imagine things, but our instructions were, if we thought he knew the nature of his act, to bring him in guilty, and we did so." Longley was asked what effect the statements made by Guiteau that the press and public were on his side had upon the jury, and answered: "They made no impression upon us. We knew he was not telling the truth any more than when he said he had received a check for $25,000." In conclusion, Longley said: "Guiteau's prophecies have not come out true. He said that the Deity would clear him, if to do so would necessitate the taking away of a juryman. We all lived, and we didn't clear him. He wished for it, I have no doubt, but none of us died, although one or two of us were quite sick at times."

Mr. Longley also said that the jury were very tired after their ten weeks of seclusion without books, papers or company, and for his part he didn't want another such trial. Interviews have been had with other jurors, and they tell similar stories.

How Mrs. Garfield Received the News of the Verdict.

A Cleveland dispatch states that Mrs. Garfield and the dead President's aged mother were at home when the first intimation came in the shape of a dispatch from Capt. Henry at Washington. When a reporter called, three hours later, Mrs. Garfield was quite quiet and composed, but said that she had nothing to say in the line of comment for the public. It is said that she has read no report of the trial, and has kept the subject as much out of mind as possible.

A Cleveland journal, one of whose editors called on Mrs. Garfield after the receipt of the news, says: "The finding of the jury was immediately telegraphed from Washington to the family of the dead President. The widow and the mother of the illustrious victim had anticipated no other result. They could not bring themselves to believe that justice would fail to overtake the vile reptile whose infamous deed had overwhelmed them with grief. But they are women whose hearts are too full of sorrow to have room for revengeful feelings, and the news of the conviction of Guiteau comes to them rather as the vindication of natural justice than as the avenging of personal wrongs. They do not see how the result of the trial could have been different. They accept it as a foregone conclusion and more important to the public, who will have other Presidents to guard and protect, than to themselves, whose great stay and reliance was so causelessly taken from them."

How The Verdict Was Received.

The verdict of the jury was received with great satisfaction throughout the country. A salute of fifty guns was fired at Madison, Ind. In Detroit, Mich., when the audience in the opera-house applauded the verdict, one fellow hissed and was promptly thrown out of the house well pummeled for his temerity. A London dispatch says that "all the newspapers not only express one opinion as to the justice of the verdict, but are certain it will be unanimously approved. Scoville says the result was no surprise to him after he heard the charge of Judge Cox. John W. Guiteau still believes the assassin insane, but sees no escape from execution.

The Assassin Issues Another Address.

On the day after his conviction Guiteau, the assassin, sent to the press another "address to the American people," in which he arraigns the character of the jurors, especially charging that they were not "high-toned, Christian gentlemen," and therefore "did not appreciate the idea of inspiration."

He denies the authority of the court which tried him, relies upon the Deity, but, as usual, makes a demand for money. He looks for a reversal of the verdict by the court in banc. The following is the closing portion of the assassin's blasphemous screed:

"I am God's man in this matter, just as truly as the despised Gallilean was God's man. They said He was a blasphemer and a glutton, etc., etc., and it seemed a small thing for His acquaintances to kill Him. But His death stirred the wrath of the Almighty, and He got even with them forty years later at the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 70, and He will get even with the American people if a hair of my head is harmed. God will vindicate me, even if the nation rolls in blood. My physical death is nothing to me. Under the law I cannot be executed, in any event, until July. I may die a dozen times before then; so I have no trouble about that. I shall not go before my time. I had rather be hung, so far as physical death is concerned, than die from painful illness or meet with a railroad or steamboat accident. I hardly think I am destined to be hung, and therefore give myself no thought on that. But I am anxious to have my character and inspiration vindicated. To that end I need help, as herein mentioned. My friends need not be ashamed of me. Some people think I am the greatest man of this age, and that my name will go into history as a patriot by the side of Washington and Grant."

Anti-Polygamy.

A large mass meeting, to express abhorrence of the great crime of polygamy, and protest against its further tolerance under the laws of the United States Government, was held at Farwell Hall, Chicago. Hon. Thomas Hoyne presided, and the Hon. Schuyler Colfax was the chief speaker. He urged the meeting to resolve that the national law shall be obeyed, and stated that polygamy has grown even stronger since the death of Brigham Young. John Wentworth and William Bross also addressed the meeting. Resolutions were adopted expressive of the sense of the meeting that Congress has the power, and should exercise it, to wipe out this foul stain upon our national fame; telegrams and letters were read from persons and places, and an executive committee was appointed to further the objects of the meeting.

Gov. Hubbard presided at the anti-polygamy meeting at St. Paul, at which resolutions were passed asking Congress to disfranchise offenders in Utah.

"WHERE are you going, my little man?" "To school." "You learn to read?" "No." "To count?" "No." "What do you do?" "I wait for school to let out."

INDIANA ITEMS.

A WOMAN in Wells county has twenty-two children.

THE Indiana State Board of Agriculture has on hand $12,460.69.

THE Democratic Central Committee of Shelby county met last week and decided to hold the County Convention as early as April 15.

A WILDCAT was killed near Hagerstown last week, the first that has been found in Wayne county for years; but the hunters are confident there are more of them in the woods.

A GERMAN with three daughters, aged 17, 10 and 7, has arrived at Elkhart, having walked all the way from Arkansas. His wife, who started with them, died on the road.

A PRETTY romance was about to be enacted in Fort Wayne. An 18-year-old boy made an attempt to elope with a 14-year-old girl, when the elder brother interfered.

MRS. CONROY, of Jeffersonville, mother of Sister Assumptia, killed by a railroad collision at Indianapolis Jan. 2, will sue the railroad companies for $10,000 damages.

JOHN BEGGS' distillery, in Shelby county, pays a revenue tax of $2,400 a day. It is said to make a larger yield of whisky to the bushel than any other distillery in the United States.

THE contracts for the enlargement of the Indiana cotton-mill at Cannelton, the first and largest in the State, have been let. The enlargement and additional machinery will cost $250,000.

A FARMER residing near Lynn, Randolph county, received from Cincinnati a letter containing two small-pox scabs. It was neither dated nor signed, but gave the advice to go home and die.

THE children of the late Gen. Benjamin J. Spooner have brought suit at Indianapolis against the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Hartford, for $10,000, the full value of the insurance.

THE wife of Charles C. Earl, a well-known citizen of Indianapolis, has filed a bill for divorce. They were severed by the courts in 1872, and remarried in 1877. Now she complains of cruelty and abandonment.

AT Eric, Lawrence county, a clergyman's daughter had her watch stolen while kneeling with penitent sinners at the altar. A young man who was suspected was next day caught in the act of digging up the timepiece in a pasture.

AT a district school in Hendricks township, Shelby county, two boys at recess secured a bow and arrow for the purpose of having some sport. In the play a son of John Hill was struck in the eye with an arrow, completely knocking the eye out.

THE development of the stone-quarrying interest in Indiana is proceeding so rapidly that there are now employed in the State eleven steam channelers, of which eight are in Lawrence county and three in Monroe county.

THE new plan for running faro in New Albany is said to be as follows: All persons visiting the faro-bank are to become members of a club and to take an oath not to reveal the names of persons they may meet in the room nor any of the proceedings.

THE Louisville, New Albany and Chicago road has adopted the name of "Monon Route," from the name of their new station, formerly Bradford Junction. The name is of Indian origin, and is said to mean "fast running," hence its significance.

SARAH GORHAM died in the County Asylum at Indianapolis, where she had resided for thirty-five years. She had of late taken daily ninety grains of opium, more or less morphine, and a pint of whisky. She has been known to consume 200 grains of opium in a day.

THE horses in Jennings county are rapidly dying off, and a number of farmers from that section report that their cattle are dying from the same disease, or something similar. The strange feature of the cattle plague, or whatever it is, is that it is only the good cattle, or those fed for market, that so far have been the victims. Farmers are alarmed.

LUKE FRANCES, a prominent farmer of Laporte county, has met with a remarkable series of afflictions within a few months. He fell last spring and broke his arm. Later, lightning struck his barn, consumed it and over $2,000 worth of property. Then rheumatism laid him up for a time. To cap the climax, a few mornings ago he fell on his doorstep, and broke both his arms and one leg.

A 4-YEAR-OLD boy at the Surgical Institute, Indianapolis, is undergoing treatment for spinal troubles, which have undoubtedly been brought about by much smoking of cigars and cigarettes. The father of the child, a respectable gentleman from Clay City, states that his son has been a heavy smoker for a year and a half, and that cigars were given to him from his infancy to keep him quiet. The little fellow will smoke twenty stoga cigars in a day, and still cry for more.

C. C. SHOWERS, a prominent citizen of Bloomington, met with a horrible death at the depot of the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago road in Greencastle. He was crossing the track of the former just in advance of the south-bound passenger train, and, having his hand up to shield his face from the storm, failed to see the train, which struck him and carried him about fifteen feet, when his foot went crushing into a frog and he fell. His legs were both cut off below the knee, his hip and side horribly mangled, and his head horribly bruised. He died in about twenty minutes.

JAMES SUBLETTE, of Putnam county, went to Greencastle and became intoxicated. In this condition he boarded the evening train for home. He was jostled off the front end of the rear coach unobserved and instantly killed. He lay in the track the whole night, and at least a dozen trains must have passed over his body. When found his remains were scattered everywhere, his head having been cut off and rolled four feet from the track, and the features of the face could with difficulty be recognized. Three of Sublette's brothers have previously met their deaths on the same road.

A HANDSOME woman, the wife of a merchant named Kirk, at Madison, told her husband that a clock-mender, who had called at the house that day, wanted to come again next day and talk with her. She told him she thought it wouldn't be proper, but would ask her husband about it. That gentleman told her it was absurd, and that the man mustn't come. But he did come; come several times, and, being a handsome man, made her madly infatuated with him. He left the neighborhood very suddenly, which threw Mrs. Kirk into a melancholy, ending in so violent a mania that she was sent to the insane asylum. The popular notion is that the clock man administered some drug which gave him his power over her, and the people would ornament a tree with him could they lay hands on him.

FORTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

The House of Representatives went into committee of the whole on the private calendar, on the 20th, and considered six bills. The Fortification Appropriation bill was reported, and an adjournment taken to Monday, 23d. The Senate was not in session.

No business was transacted in the Senate on Jan. 23, the time of that body being occupied in the delivery of eulogies upon the late Senator Burnside. The speakers were Senators Edmunds, Anthony, Maxey, Hawley, Harrison, Jones, Hale, Aldrich, Hampton and Ransom. In the House, after the transaction of some business, eulogies were delivered by Messrs. Chase, Spooner (R. I.), Browne (Ind.), Rice (Mass.) and Henderson (Ill.). Mr. Pacheco, of California, introduced a bill to repeal the land grant of the Atlantic and Pacific road. Mr. Willis introduced an act to regulate Chinese immigration, and Mr. King one to stop three crevasses in the Mississippi levee. Mr. Bliss handed in a bill to pension soldiers of the late war confined in Confederate prisons. Mr. Warner introduced an act to reduce the salaries of the President and heads of departments. No less than 358 bills were presented during the day.

The bill giving Mrs. Lincoln $15,000 arrears of pension and increasing her allowance to $5,000 was passed by the Senate Jan. 24. Mr. Beck introduced a bill for the punishment of national-bank officers who illegally issue certified checks, stating that the practice is going on at the rate of $100,000,000 per day. Mr. Plumb proposed an amendment to the constitution prohibiting the manufacture, importation, or sale of liquors as a beverage. Mr. Teller submitted a joint resolution forfeiting land grants to twenty-two railroads. Mr Voorhees introduced a bill to compel railroads to heat mail cars by steam from the locomotive. The President transmitted drafts of bills to increase the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and create the office of Assistant Commissioner; also to make the same changes in the office of the Indian Commissioner. James W. McDill, of Iowa, was sworn in for the unexpired term. In the House, Mr. Reed asked the immediate consideration of the Senate bill to retire Associate Justice Hunt, but Mr. Holman objected. A bill was passed to remit the duties on some clothing sent from Europe to colored settlers in Kansas. A resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of War for a statement of the accounts of Capt. H. W. Howgate. The fortification appropriation of $375,000 was passed.

Mr. Cameron, of Wisconsin, submitted resolutions in the Senate, on Jan. 25, in memory of the late Matthew H. Carpenter. Tributes of respect were paid by several Senators, after which an adjournment was voted without the transaction of any business. In the House the most of the day was also devoted to the delivery of eulogies upon the dead Senator. After considerable opposition, the Senate bill to retire Justice Hunt was passed, the vote standing 137 to 80. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury asked an appropriation of $23,159,690 to complete the service of the fiscal year in the various departments.

Mr. Allison introduced a bill in the Senate, Jan. 26, to provide a reserve fund for the redemption of United States bonds, one provision being for the retention in the treasury vaults of $20,000,000 in coin to take up legal tenders. Mr. Sherman closed the debate on his 3 per cent. funding bill, claiming that the large surplus of revenue was a constant temptation to jobbers, and that the tariff should be so revised that the charge of robbery could not be attached to it. A motion to table the bill was lost, by 23 to 45. In the House, Mr. Updegraff presented the petition of 4,000 citizens of Ohio for the creation of a liquor commission. Mr. Cox offered a resolution calling for the correspondence in regard to the expulsion of American Israelites from Russia. The bill appropriating $1,000,000 for the reclamation of the Potomac marshes was referred to the committee of the whole. The House adopted Mr. Browne's resolution of inquiry as to the amounts required for pensions for the next twenty-five years. Mr. Springer called up the Senate bill granting an additional pension to Mrs. Lincoln, which was passed. President Arthur nominated Frederick A. Tritle, of Nevada, to be Governor of Arizona, and Edwin H. Webster to be Collector of Customs at Baltimore. S. A. Whitfield was named for Postmaster at Cincinnati, W. H. Taft for Internal Revenue Collector, and Leopold Markbret for Assistant Treasurer. The President transmitted to Congress the diplomatic correspondence concerning Chili, Peru and Bolivia. Included in it was a letter of instructions from Secretary Blaine to Special Envoy Trescott. The arrest of President Calderon is called an intentional and unwarranted offense. Mr. Trescott is charged not to make to the Chilian Government any explanation of the conduct of Minister Hurlbut.

A Paris Wit's Performance.

One of Vivier's favorite performances: Having marked down his prey, an elderly citizen who has ordered a glass of beer and is preparing to assimilate it on the asphalt in front of a cafe, Vivier approaches and salutes him profoundly, then with mingled volubility and brusqueness thus addresses him:

"Monsieur, I am one of the inspectors of the new Department of Chemical Analysis, established for the purpose of detecting adulteration in articles of daily consumption. I have been detailed to the subject of beer. My face being know to the proprietors of the establishment, if I were to order anything they might take the alarm and serve me quite a different article and thus baffle me. Permit me, therefore, to taste your beer."

The stupefied victim offers no resistance and Vivier drains the glass at a draught and sets it down, remarking: "Excellent! excellent! You can drink that beer with impunity! I thank you in the name of science and the municipality for your unselfish co-operation. Good afternoon! Waiter, another beer for this gentleman!" and vanishes.

A BOY who takes his bow and arrow and shoots off the heads of a dozen English sparrows, is greater than the man who makes a Fourth of July oration.

Robeson Leads the Republican Party.

In the distribution of the bills to be reported from the Committee on Appropriations Secor Robeson will have charge of that of the navy. This is the place of all others which he most desired, and as the chief manager of Mr. Keifer's canvass for the Speakership he caused himself to be placed second on the Appropriations, second on Naval Affairs, and Chairman on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

Among the multitude of big jobs which have been nursed for the present Congress is one for building up a new navy, estimated at thirty millions to begin with; but which, under the manipulation of Secor Robeson and the rings that he fitly represents, will most naturally expand into eighty or a hundred millions. During the eight years that Secor Robeson served as Secretary, one hundred and eighty millions were squandered and stolen in that department, almost without a show of concealment.

Contracts and patronage were openly huckstered in the markets of Philadelphia and of New York to the highest bidder, and no honest trader had the remotest chance of being considered unless he subscribed to the terms of Cattell and other brokers of official favor representing Secor Robeson.

Promotions, choice stations, pleasant transfers and rotten claims were procured through female influence. It was a long carnival of open venality and robbery. Finally, when holding over for the coming of his successor, Robeson outraged all decency by awarding contracts for several millions, in flagrant violation of law.

He left behind him a lot of rotten hulks, of worthless machinery, and a demoralized service, to tell the story of an infamous administration, the sole aim of which was to steal the public money. Nothing like it had ever occurred in our history. Investigation confirmed the worst charges, and, when the proof was about to be submitted to Congress, Robeson's next friend, Murtagh, the proprietor of the Grant organ, and President of the Police Board at Washington, was instigated to have Mr. Whitthorne, the Chairman of the investigating committee, intrapped by regular detectives into a house of ill-repute, in order to break the moral effect of his then forthcoming report. One of the detectives refused to obey Murtagh's orders to commit this atrocious crime, and the conspiracy was thus exposed.

After all the revelations against Secor Robeson, his party stood by him at home and at Washington. He knew the secrets of the principal leaders, and he was familiar with the methods by which success was obtained. Hence he was sustained by the machine, and to-day he is the recognized Republican chief in the House. He stands forth as the organ of the party, and, of course, he intends to utilize it for his own profit.—New York Sun.

Democratic Societies.

Mr. George M. Dallas, of Philadelphia, whose character, abilities and public services entitle him to a respectful hearing, writes to a Jefferson Democratic Association in Pennsylvania as follows:

> The principles of Democracy are immutable. New issues constantly present themselves; new principles never. The Democratic party is a party of principles, not of issues. Its opponent is a party of issues, not of principles. Hence Democrats find the rightful solution of political questions in the correct application of underlying principles; but their adversaries—avoiding discussions of fundamental doctrines—appeal to passion, to prejudice or to material interests. That they have frequently done so with success has, I venture to suggest, resulted from the fact that we—regarding only supposed expediency—have too often tolerated political heresy, instead of boldly asserting and fearlessly maintaining the faith delivered by Thomas Jefferson to his disciples.

Mr. Dallas advises the formation of Democratic societies like those which proved such powerful auxiliaries in the great struggle of the people for the overthrow of the Federalists in 1800. "Such societies," he says, "are the seminaries of sound political principles, and from them they may be most potently disseminated. Never has the necessity for them been more urgent than now." Mr. Tilden puts the same thought into a still stronger form of words:

> At the time when powerful tendencies are at work to subvert the original character of our Government—to break down the limitations of power established by the constitution—to centralize the action and influence of official authorities—to create a governing class, using the machinery of Government as a corrupt balance of power in the elections, and then shaping legislation and administration in the interests of the few against the many—the precepts and example of such a man as Mr. Jefferson cannot be too often invoked.
> The formation of societies which can act as centers of discussion, and as agencies for the propagation of the pure principles of the fathers of the republic, is a measure of great service to the people and to mankind.

Four years ago the Democratic party was inspired by the Jeffersonian spirit, and arrayed upon Jeffersonian principles, by the greatest popular leader and the greatest political philosopher since Jefferson himself. The result is known. That victory was traded away by traitors; but a few thousand Jeffersonian clubs, organized in every part of the country, and linked together by proper ties, would make very sure that another national triumph should not be lost in that way.—New York Sun.

Keifer's Committees.

The Washington agent of the Associated Press has undertaken a defense of Speaker Keifer's committee appointments. He says that there are fifty-two Chairmanships distributed among the Republicans, of which the East with 66 Republican members has 20, the West with 71 Republican members has 28, the South with 10 Republican members has 4. Pennsylvania, with 19 Republican members, has 6 Chairmanships; Ohio, with 15, received 5; Illinois, etc., etc. The design of all this is to create the impression that the utmost fairness was used, geographically, at least, in the distribution of these places. What would be said of a guardian who would distribute fifty pieces of money among his ten wards and claim that it was a fair division because each received five pieces, though John's were fifty-dollar gold pieces and James' were but copper coins? Now, it is notorious that the number of really important committees may be counted on one's fingers. Chief of these is the Committee on Ways and Means. Perhaps the Associated Press defender of Speaker Keifer's Cameron committees will explain why the Chairmanship of this committee was given to a Pennsylvanian; why he was reinforced by two Pennsylvania members, and why no New Yorker and only one New Englander was placed upon this committee. He packed it with protectionists and subsidy-granters, but he was not obliged to go to Pennsylvania for these. They could be found in the delegations of other States. Mr. Keifer's committees throughout escape gross partiality in their composition only when they are unimportant. The Cameron hand that made Keifer Speaker is visible in every committee of importance. In the important committees of Ways and Means, Appropriations, Banking and Currency, Coinage, Foreign Affairs, Naval Affairs, and Postoffices, Pennsylvania has ten members, New York six, and all New England but five. This geographical inequality would not matter if the best use had been made of the material obtainable, but there was a noticeable desire upon the part of the Speaker to place strong men of the opposition in positions where they can be least useful to the country.—Chicago Times.

Dorsey in No Danger.

Bowen, who used to be an Arkansas politician, but is now a wealthy resident of Colorado, pronounces Dorsey, whom he knew in the Arkansas days, one of the smartest politicians in the United States. "I can say that with sincerity, because he beat me for the United States Senate when he had been at Little Rock only a few weeks. It was in the declining days of the Republican party, when the Democrats, under Garland, had a considerable showing in the Legislature. My competitor and myself were afraid to have a caucus, so we met and fought it in the open Legislature. Dorsey suddenly appeared, and in almost the twinkling of an eye he beat us both. Any man who sets Dorsey down for a fool is condemning himself for one. He did the work in the State of Indiana, from the beginning to the end. Though he did not know anything about the State, he just divided it up into townships and carried it. Do you suppose that such a man as that is going to be driven to the wall by a Republican administration? Nothing of the kind. It is not in politics nor gratitude to destroy a man as useful as that." Of course, no one supposes that Dorsey will ever see the inside of a penitentiary upon compulsion. This not to be the fate of the savior of Indiana and the Secretary of the National Republican Committee. He would not have been pressed to this state by Garfield, nor will he be by Arthur. Nothing short of a total change of administration; party as well as personal, will ever secure the punishment of serviceable rogues. Dorsey is not in any danger.

A FLASH of lightning made an Ohio boy cross-eyed, but one day when his mother boxed his ears his eyes flew back to their old positions and he was made so happy that he fainted away.

FOR
BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoro'ly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by

AUBURN, IND., FEB'Y. 2, 1882.

THE next morning after he was sentenced, Guiteau issued the following appeal for help.

TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE:—Twelve men say I wickedly murdered James A. Garfield. They did it on the false notion that I am a disappointed office-seeker. My speech, they said, made no impression on them. I am not surprised at the verdict, considering their class. They do not pretend to be Christian men, and therefore did not appreciate the idea of inspiration. They are men of the world and of moderate intelligence, and therefore are not capable of appreciating the character of the defense. According to one of them, "we had grog at each meal and cigars afterwards," which showed their style and habits. Men of this kind can not represent the great Christian nation of America. Had they been high toned, Christian gentlemen, their verdict would have been, "Not guilty." Not because of insanity, but the mere outward act of the shooting would have been the same, whatever the motive. If I had been a disappointed office-seeker, which is absolutely false, as I proved by my papers and Mr. Brooks' testimony, on July 2d and 3d, the outward act of the shooting would have been the same as if I had been directed by the Deity to do it, or believed myself so directed to do it, which is the literal truth, as I proved by all my papers and talk on the subject. This jury has not sufficient intelligence to see that point, and entirely ignored the political and patriotic necessity of the act, which all Christian and intelligent people see. For this reason I am entitled to a new trial, if for no other, and we have a prodigious amount of exceptions. I want to employ two or three to take charge of my case. The principal point is to show the non-jurisdiction of the court to try this indictment, because the president was removed to New Jersey. The authorities on this point are conflicting, but some of the best lawyers in America say the preponderance of the authorities are against the jurisdiction of the court. I desire the court in Banc to pass upon this question, and I have no doubt but that the high toned Christian gentlemen representing the Washington court in Banc will give it their most careful attention, to the end that, if the Deity intended to protest from the legal liability herein by allowing the president to depart gracefully and peacefully in New Jersey, I shall have the benefit of the Deity's intention. I consider it especially providential in my favor, and ask the court in Banc to so consider. I have received some checks, but many of them are worthless, which show the low character of the men that sent them. I need money to employ counsel. There are many people in America that believe in God and in my inspiration, and that I am a patriot. To you, men and women of America, I appeal. I ask you in the name of justice to come speedily to my relief.

COME IN PERSON.

or by letter. If you send money, send a postal order or check to my order. With competent legal help I can get out of this with the Lord's help, and I am sure of that. But good lawyers do not work for nothing. I want to employ two or three first-class lawyers to do my work before the court in Banc. If I had had competent counsel I should not have talked so much in court. But I disagree with the theory of Mr. Scoville and Mr. Reed, and it has made it unpleasant for both parties and has been a great damage to the defense.

Porter says I am a sight, and I agree with him, although I know he has abused and vilified me outrageously when I had no alternative, save to answer back, which I did in my usual, plain way. I have been convicted, but the verdict can not be enforced until July in any event, and probably not until September. I give myself on account of the verdict. I hardly expected acquittal. The most I expected was a disagreement. Then proposed to test the question of jurisdiction in the court of Banc. It is a purely legal question, and if the opinion of some of the best lawyers at the American bar is sustained by the Banc, will end the case. I can't get a hearing on this till April.

I make a special appeal to the ladies of America to come to my rescue. Some of them have written me delightful letters, and I ask each and every one of them to respond to the extent of their means and see me in person if possible. I return my sincere thanks for their letters and sympathy. You ladies believe in God and in my inspiration, and that I have really saved the nation great trouble and great expense, to-wit: Another war.

Last spring General Garfield had the republican party in a frightful condition, and it was getting worse every hour. To-day everybody of sense is satisfied with General Arthur's administration, and the country is happy and prosperous. Only good has come from Garfield's removal, which is conclusive evidence that my inspiration was from the Deity. He has repeatedly confirmed my act since July 2. Therefore let all persons quietly acquiesce in the expressed will of the Deity. I am God's man in this matter, just as truly as the "Despised Galilean" was God's man. They said he was a blasphemer, glutton, etc., and it seemed a small thing for His acquaintances to kill Him, but His death stirred the wrath of the Almighty, and He got even with them forty years later at the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 70, and He with the American people if a hair of my head is harmed. God will vindicate me, even if the nation rolls in blood. Mere physical death is nothing to me. Under the law, I can not be executed, in any event, until July. I may die a dozen times before then; also, I have no trouble about that. I shall not go before my time. I had rather be hung so far as a physical death is concerned than die from painful illness or meet with a railroad or steamboat accident. I hardly think I am destined to be hung, and therefore give myself no thought on that, but I am anxious to have my character and inspiration vindicated. To that end I need help as herein mentioned. My friends need not be ashamed of me. Some people think me a great man at this age, and that my name will go down to history as a patriot by the side of Washington and Grant.

CHARLES J. GUITEAU,
United States Jail.
Washington, D. C. Jan. 26, 1882.

Guiteau Sentenced.

GUITEAU FOUND GUILTY, AS INDICTED—THE SCENE IN THE COURT ROOM.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25.—At 5:25 the court was called to order, and at 5:36 the jury came in and rendered a verdict of "guilty, as indicted."

After the jury had been out about twenty minutes, recess was taken until 5:30 o'clock. Many of the audience, who had virtually been imprisoned since 9:30 in the morning, availed themselves of the opportunity of obtaining air and lunch. The prisoner, at his request, had been allowed, soon after the jury left the court room, to retire to a little room he has occupied since the trial began as a waiting room during recess. Before leaving the court room he evinced considerable nervousness, but on getting away to comparative seclusion his usual composure and assurance soon returned. He sent out for some apples, with which he treated his attendants, meanwhile chatting familiarly and good-naturedly. He was asked what he thought the jury would do, and replied: "I think they will don't you?"

Within ten minutes after recess had been taken the jury called to the bailiff in waiting that they were ready with their verdict. They were informed recess had been taken and Judge Cox had left the room; so they remained in their room until the court assembled.

The rumor that the jury had agreed was quickly spread from one to another, and excited crowds surged back into the court room, and anxiously awaited what all seemed to expect—a verdict of guilty.

The musty, antique room is devoid of gas, and the [illegible] or more candles which had been placed upon the desks of the judge, counsel and reporters imparted a weird and fancifully unnatural aspect to the grim old place. The shadows thrown upon the dark backgrounds of the walls seemed like to usher in the sombre procession of those who held in their hand the destiny of human life. First came the prisoner with a quick, nervous step, and as he seated himself in the dock, perhaps for the last time, the light of the solitary candle fell full upon his face and disclosed its more than usual palor.

Not a tremor of the limbs or movement of the muscles of the face was observed, as he threw back his head, and fixed his gaze upon the door through which the jury were to enter. Judge Cox soon afterward took his seat, the crier called "order," and the jury at 5:35 filed slowly into their seats. Every sound was hushed save the voice of the clerk as he propounded to the foreman the usual inquiry. Clear and distinct came the reply, "we have."

"What is your verdict, guilty or not guilty?"

With equal distinctness came the reply

"GUILTY, AS INDICTED."

The pent up feelings of the crowd found expression in uproarious demonstrations of applause and approval.

"Order!" "Order!" shouted the bailiff, Scoville and counsel for the prosecution were simultaneously upon their feet. Scoville attempted to address the court, but the district attorney shouted, "Wait till we have the verdict complete and in due form of law."

Order was at length restored, and the clerk again addressing the jury, said: "Your forman says guilty, as indicted. So say we all of us?"

"We do," all responded.

Another demonstration of approval followed this announcement, but not so prolonged as first.

THE JURY POLLED.

Scoville still upon his feet demanded a poll of the jury, which was granted, and each juror was called by name, and each in a firm voice promptly responded, "Guilty."

As the last name was called the prisoner shrieked: "My blood will be upon the heads of the jury. Don't you forget it."

Scoville again addressed the court, saying: "Your honor, I do not desire to forfeit any right I may have under the law and practice in this district. If there is anything I ought to do now to save those rights I would be indebted to Your honor to indicate it to me."

Judge Cox, in reply, assured him that he should have every opportunity; that the charge would be furnished him in print to-morrow and that he would be accorded all the time allowed by law within which to file his exceptions, and that he would also be entitled to four days within which to move in arrest of judgement.

Guiteau (who, from the moment Judge Cox began the delivery of his charge, had dropped completely his air of insolent arrogance and sat with rigid features and compressed lips) called out in tones of desperation: "God will avenge this outrage."

THANKS TO THE JURY.

Judge Cox then turned to the jury and said: "Gentlemen of the jury, I cannot express too many thanks for the manner in which you have discharged your duty. You have richly merited the thanks of your countrymen, and I feel assured yor will take with you to your homes the approval of you consciences. With thanks, gentlemen of the jury, I dismiss you."

With this announcement the court was declared adjourned, and now the famous trial, which has absorbed public interest and attention for more than ten weeks, ended. The crowd quickly left the court room, and the prisoner, gesticulating with his manacled hands, was led out. As he passed the reporters' tables, he leaned over and called out to an acquaintance: "The court in Banc will reverse this business." His appearance was that of a man deeply moved with indignation at some outrage or indignity which had been put upon him. As he was being put in the van, a crowd of men and boys yelled and shouted themselves hoarse, in mockery of the prisoner's constant boast: "The American press and people are all with me." The van was quickly driven away, followed till out of sight by the jeers and yells of the crowd.

WILL ASK FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Scoville will probably file a motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial on exceptions. The law gives the defendant four days to file a motion and reasons for a new trial, and it is customary for the court to set some day to hear the argument thereon. Should this motion be overruled, the defendant will appeal to the general term, and under the law, the defendant is entitled to a suspension of sentence until after the next general term, not exceeding thirty days. The January general term is now in session, and the case can not go there, but will be appealable to the April term. It is the custom of the April term to run till September, taking recess over July and August, but should it be closed by the latter part of May, then if the judgment is affirmed the execution might take place in July.

THERE was a disastrous fire in the city of New York, Tuesday, which destroyed the whole space bounded by Park Row, Beekman, Spruce and Nassau streets, including the buildings of the Times, Mail, Scientific American, Observer, Turf, Field and Farm, Forest and Stream, and a large number of less valuable offices.

GUITEAU'S counsel will raise the point that he cannot be tried in the District of Columbia, as Garfield died in New Jersey. They have filed an application for a new trial.

THEY have now a company in Indianapolis to insure live stock. It is a sort of life insurance on horses, and is payable at death or in case the animal is stole. The company wants agents.

THE shops of the N. Y. C. & St. L railroad that were to have been located at Fort Wayne are now likely to be fixed at or near South Chicago.

—The old railroad woodshed has been purchas by R. M. Lockhart, and is being moved up to the corner of Maple and Center streets; and will be converted into a portion of the sawmill to be erected next spring.

—There was a lively runaway in town on Monday. A stranger from Steuben county was driving across the Lake Shore track, when his team became frightened and ran off, heading south along Main street. An employe at the livery of J. C. Brand mounted a horse and started in pursuit, hoping to give some assistance. The team managed to turn the corner at Arthur Edgerly's in safety, and kept on their wild career until they reached the highway bridge at Jery Plum's. Here the occupants of the buggy succeeded in stopping them just as Brand's man came up to their assistance. It turned out that the man in the buggy was a helpless cripple and the team was driven by his wife, who did her best to get them under control, and finally succeeded after a wild race of nearly a mile. The strangest part of the story is, no one was hurt, and the buggy was but a trifle injured.

Complicated Diseases.

A prominent gentleman in Cerro Gordo county, Iowa, writes us that he finds Kidney-Wort to be the best remedy he ever knew for a complication of diseases. SEED.

THE LARGEST IN THE WORLD.

CORN AND WATERMELONS.

CORN. Our "GIANT" Corn is a new and distinct variety, and is withal the best that any farmer ever grew. The grains are as large as the average size chestnut; the finest white dent ever grown; full, rich in starch, perfect hardy, and never failing to grow a strong and vigorous stalk, with firm, deep roots. The ears are uniform and of very large size. It will yield more than any other variety that can be raised, averaging from THREE to SIX EARS to the stalk. It is taking the place of all other varieties upon its first trial. It is matured, and can be gathered in TEN WEEKS, and grows as successfully in the North as the South.

WATERMELONS. Our "MIXON" Watermelons are the largest and finest in the World in every instance, and grow in any section of the country. Their average weight is from 75 to 125 POUNDS. The flesh is of a blood red, very solid, luscious, crisp and sugary—far surpassing all other varieties, and, although a melon of such an enormous weight, there is barely half an inch rind. They are pronounced the finest shipping melon in the World. It will pay any farmer to try a sample package.

Corn—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00, and $5.00 per bushel. Watermelons—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00. Address all orders to the

Dr. Ford Severely (?) Caned

Friday evening last Sheriff Leas had some business that he would trust to no one (?) except Dr. Ford. The doctor and Mrs. Ford accordingly waited there until about eight o'clock in the evening, or until about two hundred of his friends could get possession of their handsome home on north Main street.—When everything was in readiness Mr. Shafer was dispatched to notify the doctor that one of his grand children was very sick up at his house. Upon hearing such news he had his wife get ready quick and they hurried home and when he reached the gate he made only two or three steps to reach the door and was about to rush in and see the sick child, but on opening the door he found the house so full of his friends that he had hard work to squeeze in. For several minutes all he could do was to stand there and scratch his head and batt his eyes, to the great amusement of those present. He finally realized the situation and, of course, made the best of it.—During the evening he and his wife were called up and Rev. Norris, in one of the neatest little speeches I have ever listened to, presented to the doctor a handsome gold-headed cane, and to Mrs. Ford a nice pair of gold spectacles. Mrs. A. S. Leas perpetrated the best joke on them of all. When the information came that the grandchild was sick, she bowed them out of her home and then hastily threw on her wraps and jumped into a buggy in waiting at the rear of the house and before Dr. & Mrs. Ford got home she got there and was all ready to received them on their arrival. The crowd dispersed at a late hour, all satisfied with the surprise, and amid many kind good nights. H.

MR. EDITOR: To the kind friends who contributed to the surprise and presentation on the occasion of the thirty-fifty anniversary of our wedding day, Jan. 28, we return our most grateful thanks. We desire to express our highest appreciation of the eloquent presentation speech of Mr. Norris made more eloquent by the presence of so many kind friends and confess to the awakening of emotions of which aroused and caused us to vibrate the chords of love and gratitude long untouched. The rememberance of that occasion will ever be regarded as a hallowed memory, to which we shall make frequent pilgrimage to kiss the sacred stone in the mousolem of freindship. In conclusion may the sorrows and pains of every guest be forgotten, the pleasure and joys of everyone multiplied a thousand fold.

DR. & MRS. FORD.

J. D KELLY.

We had expected a full obituary of the late J. D. Kelley, of Smithfield tp., in time for our last issue, but as it failed to reach us we give the following gathered from his brother, Hon. Freeman Kelly: James D. Kelly was born in Wayne County, Ohio, June 11, 1828 and removed to this county in October of 1844. He continued to reside here, and take his full share in the labors and hardships of that early day until 1852 when in company with his brother, Freeman, he went to California during the gold excitement. He remained there two years taking an active part in the stirring scenes of that eventful time. In 1854 he returned to this county and was married in the fall of the same year. He settled down to farm life, and by his industry and good management, had acquired a handsome property. His farm is one of the best in the county and always kept in the best possible condition. Early in January of this year, he contracted a severe cold which terminated in his death Jan. 15, 1882. He was buried in the Waterloo Cemetery, Jan. 17. The funeral was largely attended, as Mr. Kelley was one of the most widely known citizens of our county.

Board of Health Meeting.

The commissioners met on Monday for the transaction of business, and on Monday evening had a session as a board of health. Brandon, trustee of Jackson township, and the county superintendent were present, and took some interest in the deliberations.—They adopted for this county the main points in the rules and regulations of the State Board of Health, but extended the time so as to give the schools the oportunity to vaccinate at about the close of the term. They recommend that the schools make arrangements to have vaccination done the last week of the term, on some stated day. Then the children will be at home the next week and under the care of parents. We will publish their rules and regulations in full next week.

—We are under obligations to our friend J. L. Ferguson, of Columbia City, for a present that came by express. It is a granite paper weight, having for its handle a foot nicely carved in fine marble. The work shows artistic skill of a high order. Every part of the foot being perfect in form and dimention, and needs only to be seen, to convince anyone that Mr. Ferguson possesses rare talent in that direction. Most marble cutters confine their efforts to tombstones and monuments alone, and but few can, like our friend F., step into the higher paths of the art of sculpture.

—This week's issue of the COURIER is the largest ever issued since the paper was first established, and if any new subscribers are put on the books after the date of this local, we will still be short this week, as we have been for a week or two past. This state of things speaks more for the popularity of the COURIER as a local paper, than any words of self congratulation that we can give. Our friends all over the county and elsewhere have our thanks.

—On last Thursday the friends and neighbors of Mrs. Samuel Campbell, in the west part of town, gave her a most complete surprise in honor of her 82d birthday, notwithstanding the extreme cold weather. The company assembled about ten o'clock, each bringing a well filled basket which was spread upon a table that groaned under its load of delicacies. A number of valuable presents were also given. May she live to see many more such happy occasions.

J. J.

—Dr. Elson, the dentist, finished some fine work for Mrs. Steven Martin, at the Junction. It consists in finishing the point and edges of the front teeth with gold, thus saving a valuable tooth and making it as serviceable as ever.

—The town dog, Banna, has at last made a "mash." He is now stopping at Rainier & Headley's new meat market.

—Bob Donalson the tailor, was so overcome with "spiritual emotion" at the creek Sunday, that he baptized himself.

—Elza Shaffer came in on the B. & O. ties Saturday evening and remained over Sunday. He is the same Elz. as of yore.

—A chimney on Davis' block took fire Monday evening and created some excitement. The bucket brigade were on their tip-toes.

—February. I long for gentle spring, when the flowers bloom and the warble of the birds and the song of the katydid greets the ear.

—It will be fashionable in the spring for ladies to wear toads on their hats. Sam. Pommert will have to keep a close watch on his Toad.

—Jim Steele and "H. C. H." Ryan will go west in the spring; or in other words, as soon as the B. & O. track dries enough for good walking.

—Several persons were baptized in the creek Sunday. It is strange that people will so impair their health, but then that is their "funeral" and not mine.

—Bab Lewis and James McClellan have got two fox hounds that measure two feet from tip to tip of ears. They were imported from York State, and cost $50 each.

—Postmaster Gordon distributes the mail altogether too rapidly. I hear he makes things so hot that wax on sealed packages melts like an icicle under the rays of old Sol.

—See the man. He is holding to the town pump handle. The man is as drunk as a boiled owl. Does his wife want to see him? Yes, she does, but the man would rather see the pump.

—There were not many teams come in from the south Saturday, owing to the muddy condition of the roads. A large number of the "hay fever brigade" walked into town on the Wabash ties.

—People near the elevator are complaining of having their poultry stolen. We are informed that the theives ring the chickens neck while in the coop, and let the blood stream along to their doors. How dare you?

—I am told that Snyder & Culbertson will erect a building joining the hub and spoke factory, and establish a wagon manufactory. This will give employment to a number men and enhance the interests somewhat of the south end.

—Last Saturday afternoon, with seventy-five pound of steam on, a hole was blown in the boiler at the hub and spoke factory, necessitating the entire force to lay off. The boiler is said to be unsafe.

—I hear that a large surprise party was given at the residence of Dr. J. H. Ford, Friday evening last. The doctor received a handsome gold-headed cane, and Mrs. Ford a tasty pair of gold spectacles.

—Wm. Ilher had the bad luck to loose $25, one day last week, in the south end. This was hard earned money, gathered together "by the sweat of his brow," and we hope the finder will not be an Ananias, but return the money to its owner.

—The ice was literally covered with truant boys Monday. When a south end parent learned that his boy had not been at school, he performed upon him with a barrel stave. But now

That little urchin is out again
And walking 'bout the streets;
Walks pigeon-toed, and makes a face
At every boy he meets.
He don't sit down—the boy ain't well,
And often gets a slur;
He bites his lips and says, "I ride
A bare-back mule too fur."

—I am glad to note the fact that Miss Jennie Cowan has recovered from a severe attack of diphtheria. Jennie seems to have more than her share of "trials and tribulations" in this country of free government and equal rights. It has been but a short time ago that she went through a case of the mumps; next the chicken-pox, and last, but not least, the diphtheria.

—The boys who were employed on the Wabash road, between Butler and Chicago, were brought before "Yer Honor" Monday, to explain why they worked in a town where several cases of small-pox were, and why they came home when they were out of work and lucre. The Board of Health is getting things down fine, very fine.

—Last Thursday evening Hollister's Birthday Anniversary Club met at his restaurant and passed a very pleasant evening. Four years ago this club was organized with Dr. J. H. Ford as prest., and T. C. Mays sec'y. At the meeting in question all the members were present except four, three of whom are not residents here at present. The entertainment was enjoyable and the supper excellent. I hope they may all live to enjoy the festivities of the meeting that awaits them in 1883.

—Mrs. McDowell, mother of Mrs. A. J. Little and Mrs. E. Eldridge, has become entirely helpless. She is waited upon the same as an infant, and her conversation is dotted with childish talk. She is in her eightieth year.

—Billy Murphy had business at Cedar creek, the other day, and by mistake got on a Wabash through freight. He says there are hundreds of ties between LaOtta and Auburn; darkness came on and he could'nt count the rest.

—John Bunch took a contract of cleaning Ed. Eldridge's eve troughs out, and Jack Ralston says he went way down to Stametstown to borrow a ladder. I don't like to be personal, but at the same time I don't believe it. What earthly use has John Bunch got for a ladder?

—A pleasant surprise party was given Monday evening, at the residence of A. J. Little, in honor of the departure of Jenk Eldridge, who left Wednes'y night for Wisconsin, where he will take up the stick and rule and continue to advance in the art preservative of all arts. I wish him well.

—Considerable talk has been wasted in regard to Jim. McDowell being exposed to the small-pox while at North Manchester. In a private conversation with him, he tells me it was nothing but the chicken-pox, and the lady who was afflicted with it where he boarded has entirely recovered.

—Auburn has a speculator and she should feel proud, indeed. He is a stranger among us, and I am not yet acquainted with the gentleman; however, I have overheard him tell of buying states, counties, sections, farms, brick houses, &c. (a good deal of the &c.) I have also heard of his intention to buy out Johnnie Hebel.

—I am sorry to learn that Samuel Puffenberger will leave Auburn this week and make Texas his future home. I join with a large circle of his friends in wishing him a prosperous journey, and I hope he will use great caution when he jumps astride his pony on his mission to the ranche where his dulcinea holds out.

The other day a big, clumsy looking cow came walking up Seventh street, when she spied a pile of sawdust in the road that had been emptied from the spittoons of a saloon. There was at least two bushel of it and she ate it up clean. The cow belongs to John Slifer and has not seen bran for so long that she mistook it for this article.

—The other evening while an exhorter was vigorously denouncing sin, and appealing to his hearers to flee from damnation before it was too late, some mischievous boys tied a tin can to the tail of Hank Shull's dog and sent him into the church. I am told that the dog and can put a quietus on the exercises, and the entire congregation took various ways of serving the dog instead of the Lord. Shull offers $10 reward for the "rioters.

—A lady friend writes me and asks: 'What do you think of a young man who tells his girl one night that he loves her so much he could eat her up, and the following evening presents the hired girl with a bottle of hair oil?" I might give a great many opinions of such a fellow, but a little experience that happened to myself might explain the matter more definitely: One beautiful summer evening, while the silvery moon spread its bright rays around me, I was resting my chin on the fence, thinking of the sweet bye-and-bye. My wife stood with both heels on a round stick of wood, a short distance from me, humming:

"I want to be an angel,
And with the angels stand."

Presently the round stick of wood began to move southward, and my betterhalf moved northward. I heard a thud, groan and a yell. Turning, I saw that my "frau" had "taken a tumble," and I hurridly assisted her into the house, bathed the back of her head with camphor, and soon had her in talking order. She looked at me bias and said: "It was all your fault, so it was." I tried every way to convince her differently, but to no effect. She continued: "You know very well, Diamond Jack, that it is your place to pick up round sticks of wood when they lie about the yard, and if you had done your duty as a husband, the back of my head would not have been in this condition." I remained quiet and her words rolled on: "Just a few years ago—and you know it, too—you used to tell me you liked me so well you could eat me up." Well, I answered, my suffering gal (of a few years ago) perhaps I did say so, and if I felt like eating you up then, I am very sorry that I didn't do it. I've been married ten years.

Yours, &c.,

A MEDITATION FOR HIS LOVE.

You are a tulip seen to-day,
But, dearest, of so short a stay,
That where you grew, scarce man can say.

You are a lovely July flower,
Yet one rude wind, or ruffling shower,
Will force you hence, and in an hour.

You are a sparkling rose i' th' bud,
Yet lost, ere that chaste flesh and blood
Can show where you, or grew, or stood.

You are a full-spread, faire-set vine,
And can with tendrils love entwine,
Yet dry'd ere you distil your wine.

You are the queen all flowers among,
But die you must, faire maid, ere long,
As he, the maker of this song.

AN INFERNAL MACHINE.

During the summer of 1810 there might have been observed loitering about the Tuileries a spare, shabbily-dressed man, past the prime of life, restless and watchful in his movements, but wearing, in spite of his humble garb, an air of faded respectability and character. He was a decayed Spanish noble, Don Monsen Chavarri by name, and one thing noticeable about him was his persistency in endeavoring to obtain an audience of the Emperor. Foiled in every attempt, either through accident or the suspicions of the attendants, he invariably received his rebuffs in silence, and withdrew—merely to renew his importunities. Repulsed to-day, to-morrow found him at his post. He haunted the palace like a specter. Even the gamins soon grew familiar with the story of his hopeless quest, and he began in time to be treated with that sort of pitiful consideration which is usually accorded to those of unsound mind. At length, however, there came a day when, in the Rue de Rivoli, as the Emperor was returning from a review, a pistol-shot rang out from the corner of the court, and the bullet, whistling through the line of outsiders, buried itself in a panel of the imperial carriage. The police at once charged the crowd, and among the number arrested was our friend, the Spaniard. At the trial, there being no evidence against him, he was acquitted, but warned to instantly leave Paris. Acting upon the warning, he disappeared, and all traces of him were lost.

It was some two years after this occurrence that there began to circulate among quidnuncs of the capital reports of a marvelous clock to be seen in that city, which illustrated, by means of automatic figures, an episode in the life of the Emperor. It was designed for presentation to that personage. It was said to be the work of a famous artisan, who had lately arrived, incognito, from foreign parts, accompanied by a young lady, his daughter, who, in a supposed fit of eccentricity, had taken lodgings in a humble and obscure quarter of the Faubourg St. Antoine. The reports of the wonderful, almost supernatural performances of this piece of mechanism, and the mystery surrounding its owner and inventor, gave rise for a short time, and in certain circles, to no small amount of gossip. This gradually died away, and the artisan and his clock were alike forgotten, when an event occurred which restored them to more than their former prominence, and entitled them to a place in history.

Fouche, one morning in his office, received a letter from his secret agent in Spain, which contained information of a most startling and important character. Its perusal threw him into a state of unusual excitement, and its result was an immediate descent of the police upon the mysterious shop in the Faubourg St. Antoine, with orders to arrest the artisan and his daughter, secure the premises, and carefully guard all the stock, tools, implements and other contents from being touched or displaced till further opportunity offered for a thorough investigation. The party detailed for the duty having departed, Fouche reseated himself and waited, with ill-concealed anxiety, the arrival of the prisoners. After a considerable lapse of time, the officer charged with the arrest appeared empty-handed. His report was soon made. The lady in the case, the daughter, had that morning, at an early hour, left her house in the Faubourg, accompanied by a young lad, who bore a heavy black portmanteau. The two had been traced to the gates of Montmartre, beyond which point no clew to their movements could be obtained. The old workman himself had left the shop an hour before the visit of the police, locking doors and barring windows behind him. He bore in his arms what was apparently, according to the apple woman opposite, a great square box covered with oilskin. It seemed heavy. He sat down a while on his doorstep, when a caleche came by, into which he put himself and box, with the assistance of the driver, and was driven off at a rapid pace. The caleche was brown, the driver was in green livery. A gendarme was following him, and another was guarding the shop in the Faubourg, where, however, nothing remained but a piece of furniture and a great many scraps of brass and iron. Fouche reflected a moment, when his face suddenly whitened. Without a word, he dashed down the stairway to the street, and sprang into a passing fiacre.

"To the Tuileries!" he shouted. "Double wages for double speed!"

Arrived at the palace, he hastily alighted, and demanded to be at once shown into the presence of the Emperor. Napoleon was in the room in which he received private visitors, and thither the ushers immediately conducted Fouche, who, encountering some delay in the ante-room, impatiently pushed open the folding doors, and entered unannounced. The Emperor greeted the intrusion at first with a frown of displeasure, but, instantly recognizing his visitor, resumed his customary expression, and nodded affably. Fouche took in the situation at a single glance. Beside Napoleon there were five persons in the room. Four of these were officials of the palace—chamberlains and armed valets, who frequently attended when he gave audience, to prevent attempts at private assassination. The fifth was a man habited in a common workman's blouse, standing apart from the others, in a respectful attitude, and holding in his hand a workman's cap. It needed but a glance to assure Fouche that this person was none other than the old familiar goblin of the Tuileries—Don Monsen Chavarri. But how metamorphosed! His hair, formerly gray, was dyed to a glossy blackness; his face was despoiled of its mustache and pointed beard, and his once smooth hands were roughened as though by exposure and toil. At his side stood a large lacquer table, supporting an object on which Fouche's attention was immediately fixed. This was seen at once to be the exact model of the church of Notre Dame, wrought in metal, in the highest style of art, and serving evidently as the case for a clock, since just above the folding doors, which were perfect imitations of those which barred the principal entrance to Notre Dame, were two dials, on one of which the hours and minutes were measured, while on the other a long, sweeping hand described the seconds. Fouche, by a natural impulse, noticed the time indicated by the dials. It lacked a few minutes of noon.

Immediately thereafter he started with nervous alarm as the clock gave a warning note as though about to strike; then suddenly there was a clank of complicated machinery, and the great doors folded slowly inward, exposing the whole gorgeous interior to view. The mimic church was decorated as though for some great fete. Banners and hangings of the richest material and most costly workmanship fluttered from the ceilings and flaunted from the niches in the walls. The aisles were carpeted with tapestry and velvet, and the pillars were clustered with gold, and blazing with gems. On the opposite sides of the great nave two thrones were erected, the one being approached by a flight of velvet-covered steps, and canopied with cloth of gold and scarlet and velvet sprinkled with golden bees. And now the great bell in the tower struck once with a heavy, reverberating clang; there arose a swell of triumphal music, and a mimic procession, clad in gorgeous robes, moved into view from one of the hidden aisles. At the head of this cortege walked an old man wearing a triple crown, who, as the bell tolled for the second time, ascended the steps of the smaller throne. It was the coronation performed by automatons.

Napoleon looked on with unusual interest. "Confess, Fouche," said he, "that this is as admirable in its way as the police system in Paris. There is one mistake, however," he continued; "the great doors of Notre Dame were not open on that occasion. The throne was built against them, and the only entrance was through the transverse halls."

"True, sire," said the fictitious artisan, casting a side glance at Fouche, whose name he had just heard pronounced. "True, but your Majesty will see that it is a mistake unavoidable here. Like the rest of the world, we have been obliged to sacrifice truth in order to secure effect."

The Emperor smiled and remained silent. Meanwhile Fouche was revolving a dilemma in his mind with the rapidity of one accustomed to act in a dangerous crisis. There are situations in which a slight vantage in the hands of a dangerous man may set at naught the strength of thousands, and in which the most extraordinary means must be employed to secure what are apparently trifling results. Fouche adopted the course which seemed at first most speedily practicable, since the consideration of first importance was, in this instance, time.

"Your Majesty," said he, advancing and speaking rapidly, "may I request your immediate attendance in your cabinet for a matter of the utmost consequence—a matter which will not permit of a moment's delay?"

The Emperor turned in surprise, and frowned. Chavarri looked up sullenly and silently, and made a suspicious movement toward his clock. With the rapidity of thought, Fouche changed his plans.

"Your Majesty," said he, loudly and more rapidly than before, "Lady Isadore Chavarri has just been arrested near the Cemetery of Montmartre, charged with a capital crime. She has already been tried by a special tribunal and condemned to death. I come to implore your Majesty to grant her pardon."

As he spoke he fixed an intent, searching gaze upon the Spaniard. This time the bolt had struck. The old man's tawny face was taking on a sickly hue, and his limbs trembled.

"This is a most unusual proceeding," said the Emperor, in amazement. "Who is this lady, and what is the nature of her crime?"

"You have trusted me before, sire. I beseech you, trust me now! Ask me no questions, but write the pardon."

There was an instant of silence, broken only by the ticking and low music of the clock. The second hand was measuring off the sixtieth minute with rapid, steady sweep. Almost unconsciously, Fouche drew a pistol from his pocket, cocked it unobserved, and, with a face as that of a corpse, was raising it to fire, with a cry to the Emperor on his lips, when Chavarri, whose mind seemed torn by contending emotions, bent suddenly over his mechanism, touched a spring concealed in the rear of the tower, and instantly the whole complicated machinery of the clock stopped with a sudden metallic clang. The music ceased, the automatons paused, standing like statues, each in his place, the mimic Emperor stretched out his hand for the crown of the Cæsars, and the great bell in the tower poised midway in its swing for the twelfth and final stroke.

"Parbleu!" muttered Fouche, pocketing the pistol, and wiping the perspiration from his brow. "Allow me, monsieur," he said, advancing to the table, "to inspect this wonderful specimen of art."

"It is so delicate, monsieur," said Chavarri, hurriedly, still keeping his finger on the secret spring, and warning Fouche off with his unengaged hand.

"Here is the pardon," said the Emperor, affixing his signature to a paper as he spoke. "I hold you, Fouche, responsible for results. Well, what next?"

"Broken, sire," said the Spaniard, "and with it the plans of a lifetime. And," he added, casting down his eyes, and speaking in a querulous, broken voice, "since, when one's hopes are broken one cares but little where he goes, I wish a passport to leave France."

Fouche took up the cue immediately. "I have to request, sire," said he, "that you also make out a full and free pardon for the accomplice of the Lady Isadore Chavarri—her father, Don Monsen Chavarri, of Seville."

The Emperor smiled bitterly. His active mind had already compassed the situation, and without a word, either of expostulation or inquiry, he seized a pen and wrote. Then, having finished and signed the double pardon, he advanced with it in his hand.

"Our friend here," said he, "doubtless knows where these persons are to be found, and to him I confide these papers."

The old man, still jealously keeping his hand on the spring of the mechanism, read aloud:

"A full permission to Don Monsen and Isadore Chavarri to leave France immediately, without hindrance or question."

"Add," said he, "'and alive.'"

"You would have made a good diplomist," said Napoleon, as he made the required addition.

Chavarri hesitated for a moment, removed his hand lingeringly from the spring, and, bowing his head, glided toward the door. Just upon the threshold he turned in sudden dismay.

"Where shall I find my daughter?" he asked.

"When she is found we will send Monsieur word," sneered Fouche.

An expression of the most intense malignity flashed across the old man's face, and with an oath he sprang toward the table in the room. But a pistol confronted him.

"The pardons are forfeited," said Fouche.

"No," said the Emperor, "let him pass."

After his departure Napoleon stood for a short time in the center of the apartment in a profound reverie. Then, as his gaze fell upon the clock, and the automaton standing beneath the suspended crown within, he bent forward and regarded the figure attentively.

"So," he said, "this was to have been my successor."

It is scarcely necessary to add that the clock proved, on examination, to be an infernal machine of the most ingenious and deadly description. Concealed beneath the metallic slab which formed the pavements of the mimic chapel, and which was constructed to fold back at the proper moment, was found a triple row of small wrought iron barrels, loaded heavily with slugs and balls, arranged to cover an arc of forty-five degrees, at a distance of twenty yards from the machine. No one within that range could possibly have withstood their discharge, exploded simultaneously, exactly when the hands on the dial indicated the hour of noon; but a spring on the outside of the case gave the manipulator power to alter the "set" of the works, and discharge them sooner if necessary.

A few months after the occurrence of the incidents narrated above, Fouche received a letter from Chavarri, then in England, written in the vein in which men who have played a desperate game, and lost, write occasionally to those who have outwitted them. The writer stated that the clock was entirely the work of his own hands, and that he and his daughter alone were concerned in the plot, which had been frustrated by Fouche's promptness. As for himself, he had had little expectation of escaping, having freely resolved to involve himself, if necessary, in the destruction which should overwhelm the Emperor. His daughter, however, the only person on earth for whom he retained any affection, he could not afford thus to sacrifice. He had made provision elsewhere for her support and she had departed at as early an hour as possible, while he himself proceeded to the palace at eleven. No personal danger, no promised honor, nothing, in short, but the cunningly devised falsehood regarding his daughter, could have induced Chavarri to stop the hands of the fatal clock. He also confessed that it was he who, two years before, had fired the shot in the Rue de Rivoli. Chavarri subsequently died in extreme poverty in London. Of the after fate of his daughter nothing is known. His clock, despoiled of the murderous portion of its machinery, was preserved for several years in the Tuileries, and was finally destroyed by an accidental fire and the falling of a wall.

A NOCTURNAL RAMBLE AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

Some genius—we suspect him to belong to the jovial order of humanity—has said: "The day to drone and dream, the night to learn and ramble." We do not propose to dispute this worthy's view of the matter, but present herewith the experience of a Philadelphia journalist, Mr. William H. Cunningham, 1712, North Twentieth street, one of whose nocturnal rambles he thus refers to, beginning his narration rather peculiarly, however: "I am not a rheumatic, and have been troubled very little with bodily pains. Last Tuesday morning I experienced a very annoying stiffness of the neck, which grew worse as the day wore on. Toward evening it became very severe, and I could scarcely turn my head in any direction. Arriving home at tea time, it was with difficulty that I could eat my meal. My wife wanted to rub my neck with St. Jacobs Oil, but I refused, saying I thought the affliction would soon pass away. Tea over, against the remonstrances of my family, I left home to ramble toward the new Chestnut Street Opera House, about two and a half miles from my residence. I started in the midst of a heavy snow-storm, and remained at the theater until the close of the performance, although I could feel my neck getting worse and becoming very painful. Leaving the play the trouble came to reach home. The storm continued; the car in which I was became blocked in nearly every square, a cold current of air swept through the car, and I did not reach home until toward 2 a. m., by which time my neck had become absolutely rigid. Then I consented to the use of St. Jacobs Oil, which my wife applied two or three times before I arose. I continued its use that day, and by evening I was free from pain, and the next morning I amused myself by twisting my neck in any direction that suited me, and not a vestige of stiffness remained."—Boston Herald.

It has been asserted by Prof. Buckland that the most violent poisons have no effect on the hedgehog.

In a Cincinnati daily we notice that Mr. Tim Gleeson, ex-member of the Council from the Fourth ward of that city, says he suffered terribly from rheumatism all last winter and spring. He tried all kinds of liniments and medicines without any benefit until he used St. Jacobs Oil, the first application of which insured a full night's repose, and its subsequent use entirely cured him.—Akron (Ohio) Beacon.

SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY.

An electric signal apparatus on a French railway causes the blowing of a steam whistle upon a locomotive approaching a danger signal. The engineer is thus warned. This apparatus is found valuable in fogs and snow-storms, when ordinary signals often escape notice.

The number of varieties of insects is vastly greater than that of all other living creatures. The oak supports 450 species of insects, and 200 are found in the pine. Humboldt, in 1849, calculated that between 150,000 and 170,000 species were preserved in collections, but recent estimates place the present number at about 750,000 species.

It is a very general belief that great burial places exert a noxious influence, which must render the localities very unhealthy as places of residence. This idea is shown to be a mistaken one by the results of any inquiry into the sanitary condition of the cemeteries of Paris. The composition of the air in the cemeteries is reported to be indistinguishable from that of arable lands.

Concerning the moon's effect on tides, the Astronomer Royal for Ireland recently stated that, while the day is gradually lengthening through lunar action tides, the earth reacts on the moon and drives it away farther and farther. Looking backward, the moon must have been nearer and nearer the earth, and at one epoch in the remote ages of the past—perhaps about 50,000,000 of years ago—the two bodies must have been very close together. Then the day was but three hours long instead of twenty-four. At that distant period, the earth rotated once every three hours, and the moon revolved with it in the same time. So near was the moon that, if there had been oceans in those days as now, the tides must have been 216 times as great as at the present time; and, rising to an immense height, would have swept over the whole of England.

Animal life in the Sahara is somewhat peculiar to the region, and, according to M. Vogt, the traveler is struck with the absence of all bright colors in the animals of the desert. As a rule, their hue approaches that of the ground, and the adaptation is most remarkable in birds, reptiles, grasshoppers, etc. Black and white exist in some animals—for instance, the male ostrich—which have nothing to fear from enemies; and a single exception to the rule occurs among insects—the Coleoptera are nearly all black. To explain the existance in safety of these insects whose color must make them conspicuous, M. Vogt states that they feign death on the approach of danger and in that state closely resemble the excrements of gazelles, goats, and sheep. This description, with their disagreeable odor, gives them sufficient protection. The general color of the ground to the desert is, of course that of sand.

At the Crystal Palace, London, a second international electrical exhibition is to follow closely on the heels of the first at Paris. The objects to be exhibited are chiefly compared in these classes: Apparatus used for the production and transmission of electricity and magnets, natural and artificial; mariners' compasses; lightning conductors, and applications of electricity to telegraphy and the transmission of sounds, to the production of heat, to lighting and the production of light, to the service of light-houses and signals, to apparatus giving warning to mines, railways and navigation, to military art, to fine arts, to electro-chemistry and chemical arts, to the production and transmission of motive power, the mechanical arts, to surgery and medicine, to horology, to astronomy, to meteorology, to geodesy, to agriculture, to apparatus for registering, and to domestic uses. It is expected that the exhibition will prove much more attractive to Americans than that at Paris.

The Stature of Different Races of Men

In comparing races as to their stature we concern ourselves not with the tallest or shortest men of each tribe, but with the ordinary or average-sized men who may be taken as fair representatives of their whole tribe. The difference of general stature is well shown where a tall and short people come together in one district. Thus in Australia the average English colonist of five feet eight inches looks clear over the heads of the five feet four-inch Chinese laborers.

Still more in Sweden does the Swede of five feet seven inches tower over the stunted Lapps, whose average measure is not much over five feet. Among the tallest of mankind are the Patagonians, who seemed a race of giants to the Europeans who first watched them striding along their cliffs draped in their skin cloaks; it was even declared that the heads of Magalhean's men hardly reached the waist of the first Patagonian they met. Modern travelers find on measuring them, that they really often reach six feet four inchs, their mean hight being about five feet eleven inches—three or four inches taller than the average Englishman.

The shortest of mankind are the Bushmen and related tribes in South Africa, with an average hight not far exceeding four feet six inches. As a fair contrast between the tallest and shortest races of mankind it may be stated that if a Patagonian and Bushman stood side by side, the latter's head would only reach to the breast of the former.

Thus, the tallest race of man is less than one-fourth taller than the shortest, a fact that seems surprising to those not used to measurements. In general, the stature of the women of any race may be taken as about one-sixteenth less than that of the men. Thus, in England, a man of five feet eight inches and a woman of five feet four inches look an ordinary well-matched couple.

Marked Progress.

The last census shows a rapid advancement in the growth of cotton and food products. In 1870 the amount of cotton produced was 4,352,317 bales; in 1880 more than 6,000,000 bales. In 1870 the amount of corn raised was 760,940,594 bushels; in 1880, 1,751,449,435 bushels. During the last decade our agricultural products were increased nearly 100 per cent. During the year from 1879 to 1880 our export trade largely increased. The cattle export rose from $18,000,000 to $14,000,000; wheat from $167,698,000 to $190,546,000; flour from $35,000,000 to $45,000,000; cotton from $209,852,000 to $245,536,991; and pork from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000 annually.

English Flunkyism.

A late English paper says that the inherent flunkyism of English society was curiously illustrated at a recent fair in London. Princesses and "professional beauties" had agreed to keep stalls in fancy dresses, and the crowd which rushed to see them was so immense that it was impossible to move about, difficult to see anything, and the doors were closed to prevent a catastrophe. Nobody had any pleasure, but everybody was tired and ill-tempered, and brought away a few ridiculous things which they did not want, and for which they had paid absurdly extravagant prices. Yet the fair yielded nearly forty thousand dollars, and the paper sardonically advises the managers of "Hospital Sunday" to engage a few princesses and duchesses to hold the plates, and to be sure and advertise freely. It might be well to provide that nobody should be admitted to divine worship on that Sunday, who did not agree in advance to put a guinea on the plate. But that is probably needless. Franklyn emptied his pockets when he heard Whitefield's pathetic appeals; and no true Briton could refuse a guinea to a plate held by a princess or a "professional beauty."

Flunkys love a lord. But we know no more amusing illustration of it than a sermon that we lately saw, preached a hundred and twenty years ago. The clerical flunky is not the most uncommon, but he is the most disagreeable of the kind. We get glimpses of him at the levees of prime ministers at the very period to which the sermon belongs. They went begging for perferment, and were ready to do what was necessary to get it. Thackeray devotes three papers of his great book to clerical snobs. He would have enjoyed the one who composed and delivered this sermon, which was in commemoration of that precious ornament of his species, to whom Thackeray himself has done justice, King George II. It is edifying to turn from Hervey's memoirs of the court of that monarch, and from Thackeray's legend for his statue, to the sermon delivered at Nassau Hall, January 14, 1761, on the death of his late majesty, King George II.

"George is no more!" saith the preacher; "George, the Mighty, the Just, the Gentle and the Wise; George, the Father of Britain and her Colonies, the Guardian of Laws and Liberty; the Protector of the Oppressed, the Arbiter of Europe, the Terror of Tyrants and France; George, the Friend of Man, the Benefactor of Millions, is no more! Millions tremble at the alarm. Britain expresses her Sorrow in National Groans and Europe re-echoes to the melancholy sound; the melancholy sound circulates far and wide. This remote American Continent shares in the loyal sympathy. The wide intermediate Atlantic rolls the Tide of Grief to these distant shores. And even the recluse Sons of Nassau Hall feel the immense bereavement with all the sensibility of a filial heart, and must mourn with their Country, with Britain, with Europe, with the World. George was our Father too. In his Reign—a Reign so auspicious to Literature and all the Improvements of human Nature—was this Foundation laid, and the College of New Jersey received its Existence. And though, like the sun, he shone in a distant sphere, we felt (most sensibly felt) His benign Influences, cherishing Science and her votaries, in this, her new-born temple."

This was the way in which the Tory pulpit worshiped the throne of earthly grace and favor a hundred and twenty years ago.

Emotional Qualities of the Voice.

The following is a condensation of a lecture by Prof. Plumptre, of King's College: "We really in our speeches, as, indeed, in ordinary conversation, run up and down the musical scale without giving any heed to it—not, it is true, with separate and full notes of song, but with partially formed notes that melt or slide, as it were, into one another, either ascending or descending in the musical scale." In these words the great orator had well defined the nature of speech. The influence of the eloquence of Mr. Gladstone over his hearers is mainly to be attributed to his magnificent delivery and cultivated voice, more, even, than to his profound knowledge, and the earnestness with which he pleads the particular cause before him. Men speaking under emotion always make a difference in the length of the vowel, according to the depth of the emotion, and the real essence of language lies in the living utterance, a thought which can well be applied to the premier. The rises and falls in the musical scale are inherent to man, and every race on the earth indulges in them. Greek and Roman orators have warned their students against monotony, but it was not till the last century that speech was reduced to a system of notation, when Joshua Steele published a work on the subject. The author of this work, "Prosodia Rationalis," took down from the lips of Garrick and other eminent actors their chief speeches, and reduced them to a regular musical notation. Of course, though every note was there, they could not be reproduced with the same effect without the natural gifts of the orator. There is a law of antithesis in speech. The passions of love and hate, for instance, express themselves, the former by notes high in the musical scale, the latter low. Almost every speaker speaks under a different emotion; and, in brief, opposite emotions should be taken in opposite keys and inflections. According to Darwin's work, "Emotions of Men and Animals, as Indicated by the Voice," the voice alters, not only in resonance and quality, but in pitch. This modulation becomes expressive in the earliest period of life, and is intimately related to vocal and instrumental music, and to muscular action. Darwin believes that utterance was first associated with courtship, in its various phases of endearment, rivalry and triumph; and thought that the progenitors of man had the power of utterance of musical tones even before that of articulate speech.

A noted flirt of Akron, Ohio, is said to have all her love letters bound in a volume for her parlor table. It is a Him-book, in both long and short meeter. If this volume were to be produced to prove that she is a heartless creature she would have to plead jilty.—New York Independent.

A Good Family Remedy.

STRICTLY PURE.

By its faithful use Consumption has been cured when other Remedies and Physicians have failed to effect a cure.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion county, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption, and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes, April 4th, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured; he thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincinnati, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough, and that he was able to resume his practice.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists, Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of [illegible] Freeman, a well-known citizen, who has been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him, as it has many others, of Bronchitis.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE ostrich is liable to sudden fits of jealousy, and frequent quarrels occur when several birds are in one inclosure, resulting sometimes in the death of one of the contestants.

THE pawn is very particular about his toilet. He is one of the few crustacea which has been seen to brush himself up with great care. The front claws are fine and delicate, and carry little brushes on their tips.

THE largest steam hammer in the United States is in the Black Diamond steel works in Pittsburgh, Pa. The hammer weighs seventeen tons, while the anvil-block under it weighs 160 tons. With a full head of steam it will strike a blow of ninety tons.

THE human body is seven-eighths water. All the tissues owe their softness to it, and even the bones have a share of this fluid. No organ of the body could perform its duty, nor could life be sustained without it. Alcohol burns up the water, diseases and destroys the body.

THE hard, black German slate pencil has been superseded of late years by the round, white pencil of clay slate. At the quarry near Castleton, Vt., about thirty-five workmen produce 50,000 pencils daily, and it is proposed to increase the daily output to 100,000. The blocks when quarried are sawed into pieces seven by twelve inches, split to a thickness of a half-inch and smoothed by a planer. The block is passed under a semi-circular knife, and, after having been turned over, the process is repeated. The result is fifty seven-inch pencils. A particle of quartz in the block would break all the pencils. They are pointed by a grindstone, turned, assorted, and sent to market in boxes of 100.

WITHIN seventy-five miles of Prescott, Arizona, in the vicinity of Fort McDowell, has been found a large mound, 500 by 250 feet in extent, with walls of stone two feet thick surrounding; within and down to the depth of ten feet have been found some implements of all descriptions; also utensils of a peculiar material painted on the inside with Egyptian characters, ornaments of shell, needles of bone, and, in fact, a perfect museum of relics of the age and of a race now extinct. There were also found tombs three tier deep, and, underneath, cisterns of water. The walls are made of rock found six miles from the mound. Near the quarry are found paintings of beasts of burden, and a very large animal resembling the mastodon; also several unknown figures. The bones found in the tombs were partially destroyed by fire, and the walls showed disturbance by upheaval. This is probably the most important discovery made in Arizona.

A CERTAIN spider—found in the southern part of Europe—makes a curious cradle to preserve her babies through the cold winter, so that the spider family shall not be exterminated. She makes a silk case somewhat the shape of a balloon upside down, not quite half an inch long, and fitted with a door or cover, which may be opened, though she leaves it carefully closed. In this are placed the eggs, from which little spiders will come out in the spring. To protect them from enemies and the cold the anxious mamma makes an outer case of exactly the same shape, only about an inch long, and of course larger all around, also fitted with a closed door. Between the two cases the space is stuffed with a golden-brown colored silk, which she spins herself, and makes it warm and comfortable inside. The whole thing is hung to a bush, and left throughout the winter.

A Fumble of Expedients.

Do not attempt to keep house without a bottle of mucilage. There are hundreds of little things which may be neatly repaired by this simple treatment. It will quickly fasten this loose leaf in your school-boy's book; it speedily repairs a break in your wall paper; it will daintily secure this pretty frameless picture, or decorated card to the wall by simply touching it with a brush; a few drops will stiffen a linen collar if your laundress is tardy; with it and some pretty dado paper, or Japanese handkerchiefs from which to cut figures of flowers, birds, bamboo reeds, fans, and innumerable quaint designs, secured to a background of old gold, cardinal or any pretty tinted shade you may fancy, you may speedily and beautifully decorate all the fine stops in the house and have them match the hangings in every room. Care is to be had to make them as odd as possible and not to crowd the figures. Afterward apply a thin coat of varnish. "A thing of beauty is a joy forever," and even a common-place chimney stop is glorified and dignified by artistic taste. Handsomer ones are made by covering the stop with cloth or silesia and hand-painting them. The latter are unique testimonials for "tin weddings." Both are pretty, and by the side of them the common custom-painted ones look tawdry.

Another source of comfort is a small camel's-hair brush and a bottle of best varnish. With this potent spell you may charm away every unsightly scratch upon your furniture, by simply tracing over carefully the defect, until it is obliterated. A large brush is useful if it is desirable to varnish a whole article, and if the chemical smell is not objectionable, it is rather pleasant work, to renew the furniture throughout the house by touching it up in this way occasionally. And nothing is so cleanly, efficacious and healthy, for keeping bugs from beds, as this simple expedient of varnishing, in early spring, the whole inside frame, the ends of the slats, and the cavities where the frame unites, also cracks or knots in the wood. Repeat if necessary in midsummer.

Old tapestry Brussels carpets, which are worn and unsightly, may be utilized by ripping and turning the seams on the woolen side and finishing with a bright inexpensive border. This makes an elegant dining-room carpet.

About Worms.

Darwin, in his latest work, estimates that there are in gardens 53,767 worms to the acre, and that they would weigh 356 pounds. Having four or five gizzards apiece, each worm is able to digest a large amount of coarse food, and to bring sixteen tons per acre to the surface per annum. Mr. Darwin says that a field near his house has been cleared of cobble-stones within his remembrance, and this not so much from the fact that the pebbles have been undermined as because fine earth has been brought to the surface. Many of the foundations of Roman buildings recently discovered in Great Britain are preserved underneath this constantly-accumulating deposit of "earth mold," which is from two to three feet deep over the ruins at Wroxeter.

The Poor Sea Islanders.

"Here let me ask the sympathies of all people for the poor South Sea Islanders who are held as degraded slaves on the Sandwich Islands. The other serfs can in some way be heard. The Chinese coolies are, perhaps, better off than they were in China; anyway, they are able to take care of themselves, and they have more than once thrown defiance in the face of the Hawaiian Government. The Portuguese have a sort of Consul in Honolulu and also the Bishop of the Catholic Church to whom they can appeal in some respects; the Mexicans, and there are quite a number on the island now, have also a Consul. I do not know how it is about the Norwegians and others, but being white men they can probably be heard. But no hearing can alleviate their galling servitude. They may be simply counseled to obedience. It is different with the South Sea Islanders. They have no Consul, nobody to represent them, and as they are ignorant of both the Hawaiian and English languages, they are virtually deaf and dumb, and are driven about by signs, precisely like beasts of burden. In their own islands they never labored beyond fishing and picking cocoanuts enough to sustain life. They were free and independent men, subject alone to the call of their chief. When arriving on the plantations they find that they must work from daylight till dark and their food is not fit for hogs. They are a simple, child-like race, and not being inured to hardship they find their chains cutting into them. The mortality among them, both on the slaves while they are coming to the islands and on the plantations, is frightful. They at times die off like sheep that have the rot. They are a sad sight as they arrive, and to see them with tin labels around their necks, and numbers thereon to designate them, as they go along, dejected and aimless looking, is a sight that would move any heart (not hardened) with pity.

"I will narrate a touching incident connected with one of those poor creatures. He was working on one of the other islands, got sick, and by some means came to Honolulu to go to the hospital. The steamer on which he was on board arrived in Honolulu on Sunday, but the authorities took no steps to see into the case of the unfortunate South Sea Islander, as people there are very careful not to break the Sabbath. On Monday morning somebody made it his business to inform the authorities that there was a hospital patient on board the steamer, and when the proper authorities went on board they found the poor South Sea Islander dead. He was literally murdered through carelessness, through inhuman and brutal neglect. I was in Honolulu at the time, and I only heard one man who denounced this merciless indifference, and that was Dr. McKibben, jun., who did not hesitate to name the brutality in its proper terms. But I can not give you a perfect picture of the degradation that exists on the plantations, and of the utterly wretched condition of the serfs. The dead South Sea Islander is but one, no doubt, of many who die like dogs, and are put out of sight as soon as possible.—Honolulu Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

Habit of Untruth.

Some men seem to have a constitutional inability to tell the simple truth. They may not mean to lie or tell an untruth. But they are careless—careless in hearing, careless in understanding, careless in repeating what is said to them. These well-meaning but reckless people do more mischief than those who intentionally foment strife by deliberate falsehood. There is no firebrand like your well-meaning busybody, who is continually in search of scandal, and by sheer habit misquotes everybody's statement.

This carelessness is a sin of no small magnitude. A man's duty to his fellows requires him to be careful—for what else were brains and common sense given him? Of course that other class, the malignant scandal mongers who take a fiendish pleasure in promoting strife, who deliberately garble men's words and twist their sentiments, is in the minority, and people have a very decided opinion regarding them. Most men misrepresent because they don't seem to think that care in speaking the truth is a pre-eminent duty.

The effects of this careless misrepresenting of others are seen everywhere. Its effect on the individual is to confirm him in a habit of loose, distorted and exaggerated statement, until telling the truth becomes a moral impossibility. No other thing causes so many long standing friendships to be broken, so many dissensions in churches, so much bitterness in communities and so much evil everywhere. It is an abuse that calls for the rebuke of every honorable man; a rebuke that shall be given not only in words whenever occasion demands, but in example. The Persians were said to teach their youth three things: to ride, to draw the bow, and to speak the truth. A little more instruction on this latter head would do no harm to our "advanced civilization."—Examiner and Chronicle.

Surface Accomplishments.

That reading does not necessarily make a cultivated person is a truth not generally apparent, even to conscientious readers who suppose themselves to be going through a process of cultivation. There is comparatively small pleasure in talking of book and subjects connected with literature with an uncultured person, however he may be in the habit of reading; while in the presence of cultivated men and women, almost the first word reveals that the reading has been assimilated and become a part of their mental substance, so to speak, and there is felt at once a common ground to move upon, an unspoken understanding of each other's point of view. —Atlantic Monthly.

IT is generally observed that persons of about 40 years, especially young ladies of that age, are very forgetful of those with whom they were acquainted in childhood. This remarkable dimness of memory has been appropriately styled "The darkness of the middle ages."

THE FAMILY DOCTOR.

FOOD AND DISEASE.—It may be well to recollect that it is not the quality so much as the quantity of food which lays the foundation every year of innumerable diseases and death. Let it be remembered, also, that men need a variety of food; living on one or two kinds for a length of time will always undermine a healthy constitution. Milk only has all the elements of life; and any other one kind of aliment, used indefinitely as to time, will as certainly deteriorate the constitution, bodily and mentally. The popular notion that one or two kinds of food at a meal is most wholesome, is wholly untrue. On the contrary, several kinds at a meal, other things being equal, are more conducive to our well-being. Quantity and not quality is the measure of health.—Hall's Journal of Health.

SMALL-POX.—We again call the attention of our readers to the importance of early vaccination, in order that they may thereby secure the measurable protection it gives against small-pox, and because the degree of protection it gives may now be had without the danger of being inoculated with some terrible disease that has always attended the use of humanized vaccine. The thirty establishments in the United States where vaccine is taken direct from thoroughly healthy calves or young cattle afford an abundant supply, stored on ivory points, and obtainable by all druggists and physicians, at a very moderate cost. The fact of having been vaccinated years since does not afford proof of continued safety, and, while successful vaccination is not an infallible safeguard against small-pox, it renders its fatal termination, if contracted, highly improbable. Vaccination should be avoided when the system is suffering from manifestations of a tendency to erysipelas or inflammation of any kind. As a rule, children while teething should not be vaccinated. We also again remind our readers of the fact that a pinch of powdered sulphur put in the foot of each stocking whenever they are changed is, to a very considerable extent, absorbed by the system, and it is a most effective preventive against the contraction of very nearly all contagious diseases. Sulphur purified by precipitation (precipitated lac sulphur) is the best.—American Sentry.

Peculiar Weddings.

Numerous peculiar weddings are happening nowadays. A girl at Coultersville, N. C., was locked in a room by a father, who chained a savage bull-dog under the window; but her lover poisoned the dog, pried open her window, and carried her to a clergyman.

Mrs. Reeder, on the death of her husband, in Baltimore, received the following letter from Franklin Broillar, of Carroll, Mo.: "I have just heard the news. Will you marry me now? Enclosed find $100 to bring you and your children here." Broillar and Mrs. Reeder had been engaged before the war; but an uncontradicted report that he had been killed in battle, led her to marry another man. When he learned that he had lost her he went West and and waited twenty years to renew the courtship. She said yes.

Old Edgerton, of Bellevue, Iowa, decided to get rid of his wife and marry a younger woman. This he accomplished by means of an irregular divorce and with the consent of the original wife, who remains in the Edgerton establishment as housekeeper, while the bride plays the idle lady.

A Nashville girl being forbidden to marry her lover, promised obedience, but one day requested her father to hand their pastor a note on his way to business. Thus he was unsuspectingly led to deliver an invitation to the clergyman to call at once and perform the prohibited ceremony; and the latter, presuming that parental consent had been obtained, readily obeyed the summons.

Wicked Tommy and His Poor Mother

"Mamma, come quick! The catsup on the shelf!" "Drast that snooping cat, I'll make fiddle-strings out of her in no time, if I ever lay my hands on her. She's forever into something," and the enraged materfamilias vigorously pounded her way to the cellar door. "Where is she, Tommy, I don't see her?" "See who?" "Why the cat you said was on the shelf." "I never said there was a cat on the shelf." "Yes, you did, too. You said the catsup on the shelf." "So I did, and I say so yet. The catsup on the shelf, right before your eyes. Don't you see it? There, in that old wine bottle!" and he quietly but very swiftly dodged out into the kitchen.—Greenbush Gazette.

AFTER all the arguments about cheapness and quality it appears that Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup is the best remedy for the cure of Coughs and Colds ever offered to the public. The price is only 25 cents a bottle, and every druggist in the land sells and recommends it.

"MADE NEW AGAIN."

MRS. WM. D. BYCKMAN, St. Catharines, Ont., says: "R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y., I have used your 'Favorite Prescription,' 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Pleasant Purgative Pellets' for the last three months, and find myself—(what shall I say?)—'made new again' are the only words that express it. I was reduced to a skeleton, could not walk across the floor without fainting, could keep nothing in the shape of food on my stomach. Myself and friends had given up all hope, my immediate death seemed certain. I now live (to the surprise of everybody) and am able to do my own work."

The Number of Public Schools.

According to the last report of the United States Commissioner of Education, General Eaton, Pennsylvania has the greatest number of public schools of any State in the Union. The following table is of interest. The reader's attention is invited to the letters opposite the names of States; "a," where the number of schools is indicated; "b," number of school-houses:

(a)	Alabama	4,671	(a)	Mississippi	89
(b)	Arkansas	706	(a)	Missouri	8,096
(a)	California	2,742	(a)	Nebraska	2,776

(a)	Minnesota	3,925	(b)	Wisconsin	5,626

Massachusetts has 88 evening schools and Rhode Island 33, which are not counted in the above enumeration. In Mississippi, it is explained, that the school districts are the counties, with such cities of 1,000 or more inhabitants as may choose to organize separate districts. The figures given for Virginia count each grade of one teacher in the graded schools as one school.

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE.

R. V. PIERCE, M. D., Buffalo, N. Y.:

I had a serious disease of the lungs, and was for a time confined to my bed and under the care of a physician. His prescriptions did not help me. I grew worse, coughing very severely. I commenced taking your "Golden Medical Discovery," and it cured me. Yours respectfully, JUDITH BURNETT, Hillsdale Mich.

Cornish Prayer Meetings.

Many of the expressions used at Cornish prayer-meetings are extremely grotesque. For example, hardly any but a native would understand what a man meant when he prayed that he might be kept "from skirmishing into the holes and corners." This was simply the man's way of asking that he might be kept from doing anything wrong. Again, it is rather trying to one's gravity to hear a man allude to a certain unmentionable personage as "ould smutty face." About the time I heard this remark, and in the same parish, there was a good deal of rivalry between the Dissenting fisherman and those attending the church. The former annoyed the latter intensely by accusing them of praying at their meeting that "the devil might be hanged." Less primitive people would have laughed at such an absurd charge, but our friends regarded it quite seriously, and one of them took occasion to allude to it thus in his prayer: "They have been saying that we prayed that the devil might be hanged!" I mention this to show how unsophisticated these men are. They are wont to be very personal in their prayers. One evening a man brought two of his comrades with him, and in his prayer put forth this petition: "Lord, convert they two men over there in the corader."—London Society.

Why He Drank.

"So you were drunk," said the Police Judge to an old toper.

"Yes, sir; but under palliating circumstances. I had not touched a drop of liquor for six months, and I became too respectable.

"I began to get proud. Sometimes I wouldn't even speak to my wife when I met her on the street. Now pride is dangerous. John G. Saxe tells us that all proud flesh, where'er it grows, is subject to irritation. When a man stays sober too long he becomes Pharisaical. Socrates, you know, said that a man should get drunk once a month. I did not wish to become a Pharisee, so I got drunk."

"But did Socrates tell you to go into a saloon and fight the proprietor?" asked the Judge.

"Yes, sir. I don't remember his exact words, but, as nearly as I can recall them, he said: 'Go therefore into the place where wines and liquors are sold and for the exercise of the muscle, which nature has given you, pound the bar tender.'"

"Did the old philosopher tell you to go into a boarding-house, seize the land lady and tear her clothes?"

"Yes, sir. 'Go you therefore'—page 321 revised dialogues—'into the boarding-house, lay hands upon the wardrobe of the mistress of the estatablisement and rend her garments, for vain is the landlady who has tender clothes and tough steaks.' Am I classically discharged?"

"No, sir. You will be assigned to the philosophical employment of breaking stones."—Little Rock Gazette.

He Was a Donkey Driver.

When an Austin schoolmaster entered his temple of learning, one morning, he read on the blackboard the touching legend:

"Our teacher is a donkey."

The pupils expected there would be a combined cyclone and earthquake, but the philosophic pedagogue contented himself with adding the word "driver" to the legend, and opened the school with prayer as usual.—Texas Siftings.

RESCUED FROM DEATH.

William J. Coughlin, of Somerville, Mass., says: In the fall of 1876 I was taken with bleeding of the lungs, followed by a severe cough. I lost my appetite and flesh, and was confined to my bed. In 1877 I was admitted to the hospital. The doctors said I had a hole in my lung as big as a half dollar. At one time a report went around that I was dead. I gave up hope, but a friend told me of DR. WILLIAM HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS. I got a bottle, when, to my surprise, I commenced to feel better, and to-day I feel better than for three years past. I write this hoping every one afflicted with diseased lungs will take DR. WILLIAM HALL'S BALSAM, and be convinced that CONSUMPTION CAN BE CURED. I can positively say it has done more good than all the other medicines I have taken since my sickness.

TONY PASTOR IN TROUBLE.

Tony Pastor, of New York, who is now with his inimitable variety combination making a tour of the Union, is recognized as the leading character vocalist and variety performer of the United States. The writer of this article met Mr. Pastor recently, and found him as genial in private as he is amusing before the public. During our conversation I inquired as to his physical health, and he replied that it was excellent. He had occasionally severe pains, either the result of rheumatic attacks or colds, but any complaints of that character never trouble him long, as he had found out a remedy for all such annoying affections. I asked what the remedy was and he replied, "ST. JACOBS OIL." Mr. Pastor said that he considered the Great German Remedy an excellent preparation for the cure or relief of rheumatism, and that it was the only thing used among professional people for that distressing complaint. He took bottles of it with him whenever he went traveling, and would not be without it, and knew that it was very popular with a number of members of his own company. The foregoing, from the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle, recalls to our mind an item wherein the editor of the Cairo (Ill.) Evening Sun, in paying a tribute to the enterprise of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and expressing his sorrow at the loss by fire which the latter paper sustained, says: "The whole office was knocked into ten thousand pieces—all except the ST. JACOBS OIL advertisement, which was mercifully preserved." The closing remarks in the above and the following incident are a true index of the unexampled popularity the Great German Remedy enjoys everywhere: At a St. Louis theatre recently whilst the play was in progress, one of the lady performers met with a painful mishap, which quite disabled her. The hero of the piece, equal to the emergency, called out to one of the ushers to "bring a bottle of ST. JACOBS OIL quickly." The thundering applause throughout the entire house which promptly followed this happy suggestion was an unmistakable proof of the fact that the audience "had been there themselves," as the expression goes, and experienced the benefits of this wonderful article.

Mr. Charles A. Whitney, advertising agent of Park Garden, Providence, R. I., writes: "For three years I had inflammatory rheumatism in my right hip and knee. I employed many noted physicians, and tried numerous remedies for the ailment, but found nothing to help me until I used the Great German Remedy, ST. JACOBS OIL, which cured me at once. I am now entirely well."

New York is never so hard up that they cannot afford some sort of political excitement. The most common amusement of this kind, is a dead lock. She has a double case of the kind now, and is correspondingly happy. The state senate has been struggling for several days, to elect a president pro. tem., and the house has so far been unable to elect a speaker. One of the senators, Wagner, was killed in the great railroad disaster on the Hudson River railroad a few days ago, but even that failed to break the tie (no fun intended). But it is thought some combination will soon be effected to get the legislature down to hard work.

The Western Union telegraph company has issued a new tariff book, which went into effect Jan. 1. This company's repeated swallowing of minor telegraph organizations, and the consequent changes in rates, necessitated this step. The tariff for day messages in most cases, remains the same as before, but night messages are no longer sent at half the day rate, an amount equal to about two-thirds of the day rate being charged for their transmission. It will be seen that the company will receive one-sixth more tariff than formerly, on every night message sent over its wires. This alone, is a potent cause for the revision of rates.

Senator Logan has introduced a bill into congress, to the effect that all revenue hereafter derived from the manufacture and sale of liquor, shall be turned into a national school fund for the education of all the children of the United States. The money must be divided to the several states and territories according to the population as shown by the censuses. There are some good features about the bill, and were it not that this revenue is needed to help keep up the expenses of the government and to pay off the national debt, it would, no doubt, become a law. As it is, however, but few believe it will pass, however good it might be under ordinary circumstances.

Orth, of this state, is trying to cut down the power of the speaker of the house of representatives, heretofore, the entire work of appointing and arranging the committees, rested with the speaker. He can arrange them to suit himself. By a proper arrangement, he can manage to defeat any bill to which he is opposed, provided he can foresee that such a bill will be brought up. He can also, by refusing to recognize a member who wishes the floor, exert a very powerful influence over legislation. The following ir Orth's bill in regard to the formation of the committies: The house after its organization at the commencement of each congress shall proceed to constitute a board to select committees to consist of eleven members to serve during such congress. The board shall be selected and constituted as follows: The roll of the members shall be called, and each member shall thereupon, by viva voce, designate some one member to serve as chairman of such board, and the person receiving the highest number of votes given of a majority of the whole house shall be such chairman; and at the same roll call each member shall name five members to serve on said board, and the ten persons receiving the highest number of votes shall, with such chairman, constitute such board, provided, however, if no person shall have received a majority of votes of the house for chairman there shall be, immediately subsequent, a vote or votes until a chairman is elected as aforesaid. Second. It shall be the duty of said board, within a reasonable time, to report to the house the standing of select and joint committees provided for by the rules or ordered by the house; the names of members of each committee, to be reported in order of their length of service i congress and where two or more are equal in length of service. The names of such shall be reported in alphabetical order, and when such report is agreed to by the house, either with or without amendment. Committees thus constituted shall be permanent committees of the house during such congress. Vacancies occuring in any committee shall be filled by such board subject alike to the election of the house. Third. At the first or subsequent meeting of any committee of the house, two-thirds at least of its members being present, it shall proceed to designate some one of its members to act as its chairman of each congress, and shall also have power to fill any permanent or temporary vacancy in such chairmanship.

Thrilling Courtship.

"Don't contradict me," said the stern parent. "You have been holding secret interviews with Charles Mountserrat de Montmorenci."

He was a proud but fashionable tailor and not to be trifled with.

"How did you find it out?" sobbed the daughter. "You never saw us."

"No, I never saw you," he returned indignantly, "but my faithful Bruno came running to me this very evening with a mouthful of cloth. I recognized the pattern at once. I cut the piece to make a pair of pants for young Montmorenci two months ago, and he hasn't paid for them yet."

All she answered was, "Father, dear, it's too awfully too-too," and she fell like a little faded flower at his feet.—Brooklyn Eagle.

—We clip the following from the Indianapolis Sentinel: A hasty, although somewhat accurate compilation of the cost in maintaining the House of Representatives of this country at the capital, shows it to be about $23 a minute. Probably no reader of the Sentinel ever thought that each little remark, objection or move made by a member of the House costs from $10 to $100. How many members indulge in $500 speeches every day! And yet how many there are who indulge in $10,000 speeches, too. Three days, almost, were taken up by the efforts of Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey, to increase the number of members of standing committees. At $23 a minute, what a cost! Members often spend $10,000 in time by objecting to an appropriation of $100. The people of the country should learn to appreciate the proceedings of Congress for they are very high priced, very rare.

Practical Proverbs.

"I wouldn't gin a cent for de man who quotes old proverbs an' adopts second-han' mottoes," began Brother Gardner, of the Detroit limekiln club, as the crunching of harvest apples suddenly ceased. "Dis am an sige for ebery man to hold his own plow, an' who am content to let some one else hold it must be satisfied wid cobs in place of co'n. Ef I was so poo' an' low-down dat I had to pick rags, I would have my own maxims an' mottoes. Instead of sayin' 'Doan' put off till to-morrow what kin be dun to-day,' I would have it: 'Now, ole man, you git right up 'n dust, an' sling mo' rags dis week dan any odder chap kin in a month.' 'De odder day I met Come-back Jones You know he am 'bout sixty y'ars old, an' 'bout as hard up as a woodchuck in a b'ar's grip. I axed de ole man how he was keepin' up wid de purceshun, an' he replied, "Wall, ise mighty hard up; but dey say it am a long lane dat has no turn." Jist fink of an ole man wid one No. 13 in de grave waitin' fur a turn in de lane to bring him heaps to eat an' lots to w'ar!—All frew life he has carried dat second-han' sayin' wid him, an' am yet a believer in it. Why didn't he have one of his own? If he had said forty years ago: "Doan' foller any lane, but cut cross-lots," de wolf wouldn't be arter him to-day. A man who has de will to make a motto has de pluck to make it a success. 'Buckle down to bizness' am a better motto dan any book kin give ye. Let me, in closin', quote some of de mottoes an' maxims belongin' to members of dis club:

Giveadam Jones—'Git dar,' if it takes a leg.

Elder Toots—'Take a job at fust sight, but doan' trade hosses till yer fink it ober."

Rules of County Board of Health.

At a meeting of the Board of Health of DeKalb county, Ind., the rules and regulations adopted by the State board were re-adopted by said board for the use and regulation of the health bureau of DeKalb county:

All "rules and regulations" of the State Board of Health are mandatory, and by provision of the law "establishing a State Board of Health," etc. (sec. 9) a fine not less than $5 is incurred by any person who shall neglect or refuse to comply with the requirements of such "rules and regulations" each day of such "failure or refusal" after proper notification, constituting a separate offense.

The local Boards of Health throughout the state are hereby required to "promulgate and enforce" the rules herewith issued, and to enforce the penalty in the case of "failure or refusal" of any person to comply with the requirements thereof.

Vaccination, when successfully performed, with reliable virus, undoubtedly modifies, if it does not furnish absolute protection from small pox; but in view of the fact that there are many instances in which the vaccine disease (for some cause) does not pass regularly through all its stages, therefore becoming a spurious vaccination, the State Board earnestly recommend the re-vaccination of all persons, old and young, who are not known to have been successfully vaccinated at some former time with non-humanized bovine virus. More especially should this precaution be taken during the prevalence of small pox in a neighborhood. By the observance of this rule, and primary vaccination in youth, one of the most loathsome diseases may be effectually prevented.

Physicians shall certify as to successful vaccination upon blank forms, (physician's certificates) as issued by order of health officer, and school boards, township trustees, etc., shall see that teachers, upon receipt of such certificates, shall file the receipt and record in a book furnished by such school board, etc., the name of the child presenting such certificate, the date of such and name of physician certifying. This rule is made so that when a child is certified to once, the evidence can be had if it should remove to another health precinct or school, thus obviating a second examination.

Township trustees, school boards, or similar officers are to report to their several local boards of health the name and residence of any person under their supervision who refuses or neglects to obey the rules as promulgated by boards of health; but not to prosecute. All persons and corporations are to obey the rules of health boards, but such boards are the organizations that can enforce such rules or conduct prosecutions.

Upon notice being given of cases of small pox or varioloid, to the board of health of a county, city or town, or to the health physician thereof, or whenever any member of said board or the health physician shall have knowledge of any cases of small pox or varioloid within their jurisdiction, some member of the board or the health physician, shall cause a red cloth, or card having "small pox" conspiciously printed thereon, not less than twelve inches square, to be fastened upon the front door, or other conspicious place of each building in which such sickness prevails, said cloth or card to be maintained during the existence of the disease, and until such time as the health physician is satisfied the premises have been properly cleaned, disinfected and purified. In case of scarletina, diphtheria or rubeola, a yellow cloth or card should be used in the manner in which red is used in small pox. If said red or yellow cloth or card is removed without any authority from the health physician, the name of the person, or the head of the family, occupying the premises, together with the number of the street, or location, shall be published, and the person removing said cloth or card, or causing their removal without authority of the health physician, shall be fined a sum not less than $5 nor more than $25.

Every person affected with small pox or varioloid, shall be isolated as much as possible from all other persons, and shall occupy a room in which there are no unnecessary articles of furniture, as carpets, cushioned chairs, lounges, window curtains, clothing, etc. The rooms which have been occupied by such diseased person should, if papered, have the paper removed entirely from the walls; the walls should be whitewashed; the floor scrubbed; the room thoroughly fumigated, disinfected and ventilated before permission is granted to remove the cloth or card of warning.

SPECIAL RULES:

After April 1st, 1882, no person, until after they have been successfully vaccinated shall be admitted into any public or private school of learing within this county, either in the capacity of teacher or pupil, and all persons admitted therein shall present to the principal thereof the certificate of a reputable physician as to the fact of their being successfully vaccinated.

It shall be the duty of all unvaccinated persons within this county to be successfully vaccinated within 60 days from Feb. 1, 1882. And all unvaccinated persons coming into this county shall be required to be vaccinated within 60 days after coming into the county.

All children born within this county shall be successfully vaccinated within twelve months after birth. All vaccination shall be with reliable bovine virus.

—The health officer will see that vaccination is performed with non-humanized virus.

NOTE—An accoucheur is not recognized by the act creating the State Board of Health as a physician. Such must report birth and death, but can not give certificate of vaccination.

The board, after adopting these rules, added the following:

Provided, always, that no person shall be compelled to be vaccinated when in the opinion of a competent physician, such person is not in a physical condition to be vaccinated with safety.

Provided further, that these rules and regulations shall not be construed so as to conflict with the rules and regulations of incorporated towns in this county.

By order of
COUNTY BOARD OF HEALTH.
J. B. CANBERER, Sec'y.

Opinion of State Supt. Bloss.

INDIANAPOLIS, Jan. 10, 1882.

Dr. Thad. M. Stevens, secretary State Board of Health.

SIR: Your statement in reference to vaccination in the public schools has been received, and I take pleasure in answering:

The township trustees and the school boards of cities and towns have the right to expel pupils from the schools. The teachers do not have such power. I have, when questioned on this subject by trustees and teachers, made the following statements:

1. It is the duty of the teachers to carry out the directions of school boards and township trustees in reference to vaccination.

2. School boards and township trustees, when legally notified by the local boards of health, may, if directed by said board, suspend all pupils who do not comply with the rules of said board in reference to vaccination.

3. That school boards and township trustees, in order to free themselves from liability to prosecution by the board of health, should report to the local board the names of all children (also the names of their parents or guardians) who refuse to comply with the law, and who have in consequence been suspended from school.

4. That it is not the duty of school trustees to institute criminal proceedings against those refusing to comply with the orders of the board of health.

Respectfully yours,
JOHN M. BLOSS.
Superintendent Pub. Inst.

VACCINATION.

Few persons correctly understand what the term really implies. It implies the production of a specific disease called vaccinia, which only can be perfectly produced by the introduction of pure non-humanized vaccine virus, which is first obtained from the cow where it is generated spontaneously; then by inoculation of a healthy heifer we obtain the pure bovine virus. At this time when there is so much being said upon this subject, both for and against vaccination, I thought it might not be amiss to offer a few words to the public upon this question. Nearly everybody has a notion and theory of their own relative to its protective power against small pox. Many instances have been cited where persons have had small pox and some have died of the disease, after having been vaccinated and hence they say that vaccination does not amount to much, or is no protection at all. I find that the matter is very imperfectly understood, and I am sure if it was, there could not be any considerable conflict of opinion nor hesitation about vaccination and re-vaccination. The fact that a vaccinated person in a particular instance is taken down with small pox is not a legitimate argument against vaccination in the true sense of the term.—There are several reasons why the operation has not been successful: The virus may not have been of good quality, although it may have caused a sore arm. In many instances, if examined by one competent to judge, it would be found not to possess the characteristics of the true vaccinia pustule. This I am satisfied from my own observations as well as that of many others, is a common occurrence. The effects of vaccination may have disappeared from the system; it certainly does pass from the system of some much sooner than from others, as shown by vaccination. Then again humanized virus, which has passed through the system of one or several persons, has been used and not only become deteriorated but in many instances contaminated, and is not as safe and complete a protection as when the true non-humanized virus is used. All of the above precautions may be strictly observed and still the vaccinated person may have small pox, because, while the individual may have been vaccinated, yet he has not been vaccinized—in other words his system has not been so completely charged with vaccinia as to entirely overcome the susceptibility to small pox. A very large proportion of the vaccinated have not been vaccinized, in many instances, because improper virus has been used, and in many more, because they have not been sufficiently re-vaccinated to completely overcome the susceptibility of their systems. If everybody would enjoy complete immunity from small pox, they must vaccinate and re-vaccinate so long as there is the slightest trace of the essential characters of the vaccine pustules at the point of insersertion.

The sabbath-school workers of Richland and Fairfield townships met at the U. B. church in Corunna, Saturday, January 28, 1882. After a song by the audience (with Mrs. Freed at the organ), Elder Harding led in prayer, and Wm. Parks delivered the welcome address. There were four subjects of sabbath-school work taken up and discussed in the presence of nearly three hundred hearers, by the following gentlemen: Rev. Paschall, Elder Harding, L. D. Britton and Rev. Kelso, of Auburn; each speaker being followed by voluntary speeches. Mrs. Ella Grate, of Sedan, delivered an essay on the first lesson of the present quarter. Written reports, six schools of Richland and one of Fairfield, were read and handed in, which showd a corps of 39 officers, 29 teachers and an average attendance of 379 scholars. The drawer box was then opened, containing 18 questions, which were read from the stand and answered by members of the society. The programme being carried out by our worthy president, the society adjourned to meet at Sedan on the last Saturday in April.

Golden Wedding.

Last Thursday, January 26th, at Spencerville, a large number, at least ninty persons, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the marriage of Jeremiah Rhodes and his wife by calling upon them, extending their congratulations and partaking of a bountiful repast at the residence of their son-in-law, Wm. C. Tindall.

It was probably the most enjoyable occasion that ever the good people of that village experienced, all feeling too joyous and happy to ever think of the rain and inclement weather without. Tears of gladness, handshaking and blessings were the order of the afternoon and evening.

Among the presents there was a gold headed cane, a cake basket, napkin rings butter knife, a rocking chair, driving whip, eleven dollars in gold from Auburn friends and seventy seven dollars from friends at Spencerville and St Joe.

There were present at the marriage and the Golden anniversary the widow of Daniel Rhodes, an early settler of this county and a Mrs. Johnson a sister of Mr. Rhodes There was also present their only living child Mrs. Tindall, two grand children and two great grand children. Wm. H. Dills, Esq., of Auburn, made the presentation speech on the part of the donors in a few timely and appropriate remarks and Esq. Barney, of Spencerville, in a few happy words accepted the gifts on behalf of the old people.

Mr. Dills' presentation remarks were substantially as follows:

Mr. and Mrs. Rhodes; Dear old uncle Jerry and aunt Ann. I have been selected by some of your friends who have seen proper by their generosity to make you a few presents to say a few words in their behalf. This is the golden or fiftieth anniversary of the day when when you in youth selected each other for companions for life and when you according to the laws of God and man plighted your honors and faith to love comfort and esteem each other as husband and wife. How short and yet how long has been that period, It is only to a few that this happy occasion is allotted by a kind Providence. Of the company present only a few have been premitted to live that length of time.

You my good old friends shortly after your Marriage removed to this county and near this place, then an almost unbroken wilderness. Your lives, your labors and your examples have been impressed upon this community and on the side of religion, morals, education and charity in the society in which you have so long lived, and we to-day are reaping the benefits of that religion that education and that example. You during that relation we to-day celebrate have seen generations born and pass away. We have been the play and school mates of your children and your grandchildren, we have seen you around the communion table with our parents and brothers and sisters, you have administered to the dying wants of our loved ones and you have mourned and mingled your tears with ours for our departed dead as we have with yours for your dead children and grand children. You have thus become a part of our community, our society and in fact a part of our own family. All who are here to-day and those for whom I speak have received your hospitalities at your table, with kind words of advise and affection from pour lips. Therefore we come to greet you and place crowns of honor upon your aged heads, and with our blessings and prayers that there may yet be allotted you by a kind Providence, many years of the relations you have so long and honorably sustained.

Therefore, now, my good old friends, in behalf of your friends at Auburn, I present you these coins of gold, and from friends at this place and St. Joe, these other coins of gold; this gold-headed cane: this rocking-chair, cake-basket, napkin rings and butter knife; and this whip by your neighbor, O. W. Rummel. Please accept them in the spirit they are given. Use, keep and enjoy them as you may deem proper. We know that you are not in affluent circumstances, nor in need. But the coin we give we do not desire you to hoard away to be lost or forgotten; we desire that you use it for your own comfort and enjoyment, and if the same will add one day or week to your earthly existence, or alleviate and free you from one pang of suffering or pain, we shall be well repaid for our act on this occasion.

Letters of regret and congratulation were received and read from Mrs. Morris and Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Dawson of Fort Wayne and Mr. and Mrs. Askew, of Auburn and many others.

"The doctor told me to take a blue pill, but I didn't for I had already been poisoned twice by mercury. The druggist told me to try Kidney-Wort, and I did. It was just the thing for my biliousness and constipation, and now I am as well as ever." Torpid kidneys and liver is the trouble, for which Kidney-Wort always proves to be the best remedy known.—Hartford Courant.

On being pursued, he killed himself with his shot-gun, literally blowing his head to pieces. There is no explanation of the affair.

THE death is announced of the Rev. Henry W. Bellows, the eminent Unitarian clergyman and author. He was born in Boston in 1814, and was nearly 68 years of age.

THE WEST.

MRS. HIGH, teacher of a public school at West Jefferson, Ohio, called in John Butler, one of the Directors, to assist her in quelling a disturbance among the pupils, instigated by a boy named George Scott. Butler so enraged Scott that the latter struck Butler on the head with a piece of coal and crushed his skull....Small-pox among the clerks killed the patronage and caused the failure of a dry-goods firm in Mansfield, Ohio.

FOOT-PADS have bred a reign of terror in Indianapolis. The attendance at the theaters has fallen off one-fourth, and a leading clergyman advocated from his pulpit the carrying of arms in self-defense.

THE aged wife of Gen. George P. Dorris was murdered near St. Louis, Mo., by her grandson, Russell Brown, and a companion named Patrick McGlew. Brown made a full confession that they choked the old lady to death and stripped the rings from her fingers. Young Brown is the son of a prominent lawyer and Prosecuting Attorney in St. Louis county. The affair creates a great deal of comment, on account of the position of the parties concerned....Four men were drowned at New Westminster, British Columbia, while trying to cross a river in a canoe.

A YOUNG man who came forward at a revival meeting in New Carlisle, Ind., gave his name as Arthur Thomas, a Chicago burglar, and stated that he had selected two safes to be robbed that night, and had strayed into church to kill time. He surrendered his tools, and accompanied the Sheriff of Whitley county to Ormas, to be tried for a burglary committed at that place.

NEAR Logansport, Ind., a tramp named William Steele called on Mrs. Buell for supper. Finding the woman alone, he outraged her person, and fled. The neighbors immediately pursued, caught him, and, without delay, hung him. Then they piled brush about him, and burned the body past recognition. The Sheriff took possession of the body and turned it over to the Coroner.

POLITICAL.

THE President has yet over 1,000 appointments to make. In the list is a number of important diplomatic and consular positions. ....A Washington dispatch says the President has refused to accept the resignation of Defrees, the Public Printer. He has been requested to remain in office during Mr. Arthur's administration.

A ST. JOHN (N. B.) dispatch announces the burning, at sea, of the ship Excelsior, with a loss of several lives.

IN regard to the disposition of Guiteau's body, Scoville says it remains to be decided by the prisoner's brother and sister. The remains could not be protected from resurrection, and the proceeds of their exhibition could be used in paying debts. Mrs. Scoville was interviewed in Chicago, and stated that the body should not be shown if she starved to death; beside, she said, Charles is not going to be hanged. Charles Reed denounces Scoville for proposing to exhibit the assassin's refrigerated corpse, and refuses to be associated with that worthy any longer.

WASHINGTON.

SCOVILLE and the Warden of the Washington jail have agreed that no more of Guiteau's blasphemous addresses to the public shall be given out, and that for the present no one shall be permitted to interview him.

THE bill introduced in the House by Mr. Smith, of Illinois, requiring the Surgeon General to furnish pure vaccine virus to the public at cost, has also been introduced in the Senate by Gen. Logan.

THE Anti-Polygamy bill reported by Senator Edmunds from the Judiciary Committee strikes out from the shoulder in every direction. It provides for the punishment of men in the Territories who marry more than one woman, or who live with more than one woman as wife; for the punishment of women who marry men who already have wives; prevents polygamists from serving on juries; disfranchises all polygamists, both men and women, and puts Utah for election purposes under the rule of a commission appointed by the President.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says that Guiteau is very much subdued, and says little except to his guards. District Attorney Corkhill has received from Cameron, Mo., a package of new rope with which to hang the assassin. Mr. Scoville has accepted a proposition from a manufacturer of refrigerators in Philadelphia to take Guiteau's body immediately after death, preserve it, and exhibit it in all the principal cities of the United States and Europe, half the receipts to go to the relatives.

ADDITIONAL NEWS.

A GENTLEMAN who has taken much interest in the matter—telegraphs a Washington correspondent—says he is satisfied, after careful inquiry, that the President does not intend to do anything in regard to the Fitz John Porter case, not even to the extent of granting him a pardon, which would restore him to full citizenship again.

THE Grand Jury investigated the Spuyten Duyvil disaster and returned an indictment against George F. Hanford, conductor, and George Melius, brakeman, of the wrecked train, charging them with manslaughter in the fourth degree. The jury censure Superintendent Toucey and the managers of the New York Central railroad for not having the cut better guarded, and for allowing too high a rate of speed through it. They advocate some method for car illumination other than mineral oil, and say heating cars by fire should be abolished. They should be heated by hot air, steam or hot water.

When the 3 per cent. funding bill came up, the Davis amendment to make the bonds payable at the option of the Government was carried by 38 to 26, and an amendment by Mr. Sherman to make their duration three years was lost by 25 to 36. Mr. Ferry introduced a bill for pensions to inmates of Confederate prisons. The Senate adjourned to Monday, the 30th inst. The President nominated John Campbell for Surveyor of Customs at Omaha; William D. Lewis for Postmaster at Vincennes, Ind., and Theodore D. Wilson, of New York, to be Chief Constructor of the Navy. In the House, Mr. Townsend called on the Secretary of the Interior for any information at command in regard to Indian outrages in Arizona incited by the Mormons. Several private bills were passed, but the bill for the relief of the children of Gen. James H. Carleton was lost. The President transmitted a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, giving information in regard to the Chiriqui grant. An adjournment to Monday was taken.

A favorable committee report was made to the Senate, on the 30th ult., on the bill for a public building at Peoria, Ill. Mr. Edmunds reported favorably the bill to re-establish the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and for the distribution of the remainder of the Geneva award. Mr. Ferry introduced a bill for a water route to facilitate transportation between Lakes Michigan and Erie. In the House, Mr. Berry introduced a bill to fix railroad fares at 3½ to 4½ cents per mile. Mr. Berry also introduced a bill proposing a constitutional amendment making any person holding the office of President of the United States ineligible for re-election, granting an annual pension of $6,000 to all ex-Presidents, and making Cabinet officers ineligible to election to the Presidency for the term following that during which they served as members of the Cabinet. The Sherman funding bill was taken up, and the Vest amendment was defeated and that by Mr. Plumb was agreed to. The latter provides for a redemption fund of only $100,000,000. In the House, Mr. Springer introduced a resolution calling on the Postmaster General for copies of all correspondence in regard to the necessity of weighing the mails between New York and Chicago. A resolution was adopted requesting the President to obtain a list of American citizens confined in English prisons. Mr. Robeson modified his resolution as to railroad land grants to include all but the Pacific roads. The annual post-route bill was reported and passed. Mr. Colerick introduced an apportionment bill fixing the number of representatives at 316, and Mr. Cox presented one providing for 307.

Several petitions for the suppression of polygamy were reported in the Senate on the 1st inst. A favorable report was made on the bill appropriating $15,000 to the National Board of Health for supplying the people with vaccine virus at cost price. A resolution was adopted calling on the President to furnish copies of all correspondence relating to a congress of American nations. The Sherman Funding bill was taken up, and amendments were adopted recognizing as binding the agreement made for the extension of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, and providing that the act shall not be construed to authorize the increase of the public debt. Mr. Sherman said that if Mr. Plumb's amendment were not stricken out he should vote against the bill. The President nominated J. S. Runnels as United States District Attorney for Iowa; Marsden C. Burch, United States Attorney for the District of Michigan; Hugh J. Campbell, for the District of Dakota; W. H. Armstrong, of Pennsylvania, Commissioner of Railroads. An amendment by Mr. Hoar, asserting the legality of the action of Secretary Windom in extending the 5 and 6 per cents, was adopted, after a hot debate. THE GUITEAU TRIAL.

Applying for a New Trial.

Mr. Scoville appeared in the Criminal Court at Washington Jan. 28, and filed papers on which he bases his motion for a new trial. F. H. Snyder and J. W. Guiteau made affidavits that a newspaper was found in the room occupied by the jurors, on which five of them had written their names. Mr. Scoville makes the points that the verdict was an uncertain one; that the trial was unlawfully extended into the December term of court, and that the court had no jurisdiction of the cause. The five jurors whose signatures are alleged to have been found on a newspaper in their room declare that a forgery has been committed. They are quite indignant, and denounce the charges of improper conduct on their part. Mr. Corkhill remarked to a party of gentlemen that Guiteau will be executed not later than June 10.

In the Criminal Court at Washington, on the 30th ult., District Attorney Corkhill asked Judge Cox to fix a day for hearing the arguments for a new trial of Guiteau. Mr. Scoville stated the rumors prevalent in regard to newspapers having been furnished the jurors, and asked that the latter be produced in court or their depositions be taken by a commission. Friday, Feb. 3, was fixed for a further hearing.

A prominent man in Washington predicts that the President will pardon the assassin on the ground of insanity.

Mr. Scoville issued an appeal to the American people for $2,000 to secure competent counsel to push the movement for a new trial. He says Guiteau's mail will hereafter be dumped into the Potomac, unopened.

The New Apportionment.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30.

The House Committee on Census has virtually agreed to increase the number of Representatives from the State of Illinois from twenty to twenty-one, which will make the total number of Representatives 320 instead of 319, as proposed by the McCord bill. The apportionment to each State under the bill is: Alabama 8, Arkansas 5, California 5, Colorado 1, Connecticut 4, Delaware 1, Florida 1, Georgia 10, Illinois 21, Indiana 13, Iowa 11, Kansas 6, Kentucky 11, Louisiana 6, Maine 4, Maryland 6, Massachusetts 12, Michigan 11, Minnesota 5, Mississippi 7, Missouri 14, Nebraska 3, Nevada 1, New Hampshire 2, New Jersey 7, New York 34, North Carolina 9, Ohio 21, Oregon 1, Pennsylvania 10, Texas 10, Vermont 2, Virginia 10, West Virginia 4, Wisconsin 8.

A Washington correspondent says the Apportionment bill agreed upon by the House committee "is cunningly contrived to obtain the united support of the big States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois, having a total vote of ninety-nine in the House. To this number must be added Iowa with nine votes, Massachusetts with eleven, Michigan with nine, Kentucky with ten, Missouri with thirteen, Indiana with thirteen, Virginia with nine and Georgia with nine, all of which gain one member each, between 307 (Mr. Cox's number) and 320, which is the number agreed upon by the House committee. But it is not conceivable that the 320 bill will get through the Senate without amendment. It deprives Rhode Island, Florida and California of a member each. The whole Democratic vote will be cast against it in the Senate, and the Republican Senators from Rhode Island and California will not agree to it. A not improbable solution of the question is the passage of the present bill with an amendment giving an extra member each to Rhode Island, Florida and California."

Probable Fate of Lieut. De Long.

Interesting information concerning the fate of Lieut. De Long, commander of the Jeannette, comes from Lieut. Danenhower at Irkutsk. The record "cached" by Lieut. De Long shows that his party, consisting of fourteen officers and men, reached a deserted hut Sept. 24, and from thence proceeded in their endeavor to reach some settlement on the Lena river. Later records were found showing that on the 9th of October two men were sent ahead for relief, and that after marching south for fifteen days they were found in a starving condition by natives and taken to a settlement. Efforts to find Lieut. De Long's party had to be abandoned by reason of the refusal of the natives to go on further, and a Russian force was then organized, and is now searching. There is reason to fear that starvation may have been the fate of the De Long party, as they had but two days' provisions, and there was nothing to depend upon for subsistence but the precarious supply of game afforded by that desolate region. Secretary Hunt has selected Lieut. Giles B. Harber and Master W. H. Scheutze, of the navy, to proceed to Siberia and assist Lieut. Danenhower in his search for the missing explorers.

Ten Persons at Table.

Flammarion, in his latest work, "Les Etoiles" (The Stars), goes into a very singular calculation, which no one would believe unless it were susceptible of mathematical proof, as it is: Ten persons seated at the same table can change places so as to produce 3,628,800 different combinations! If, through modesty or vanity, any of the guests happened to disagree on the point of precedence, and if it were decided to continue the dinner day by day until all the combinations had been exhausted, these ten persons would have to dine together day after day for 9,888 years. Supposing the dinners to have begun as soon as Adam and Eve had eight descendants, the series of dinners would still have more than 3,000 years to run, since tradition places the first parents of the human race only 6,000 years back.

FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Loss $1,000,000—A Number of Persons Burned to Death.

A disastrous fire, entailing a loss of about $1,000,000 and the death of at least seven persons, occurred at New York in the five-story building with two cellars owned by Orlando B. Potter, and occupying the south half of the triangular block bounded by Park row and Nassau and Beekman streets. The building was almost exclusively occupied by people engaged directly or indirectly in the printing and publishing business. A number of weekly papers, among them the Observer, the Scientific American, the Turf, Field and Farm, the Scottish American and others, had their offices there, and there, too, several leading advertising agencies were located. Adjoining and separated by a party wall, was the office of the New York Times, which narrowly escaped complete destruction, and near by was the postoffice building, which was at one time thought to be in great danger. In the rickety old fire-trap in which the flames originated, and which should long ago have been remodeled or else pulled down as a dangerous structure, were employed 500 people, who were all at work when the fire broke out in the hall on the lower floor. The rush for safety through the narrow passage developed with terrible force the danger that had long been known to exist. The means of egress were shamefully insufficient, and an awful horror filled the hearts of the vast multitude which assembled in the City Hall Park as spectators of the frightful drama. The scenes as described in our dispatches were fearful almost beyond imagination—500 people penned up like rats in a blazing trap leaping from the windows to find death on the cruel pavement below, or falling back into the flames through fear of taking the appalling leap; 100,000 people gathered to watch the issue of life and death, powerless to save or succor. Six or seven persons were taken from the building by firemen or others on the Nassau street side, eight or ten on Beekman street, and five or six on Park Row. The number of deaths assured is five. Ellen Buck, a colored woman 34 years old, janitress of the building, who jumped from the fifth story and had her skull fractured. Joseph Cunningham, foreman of the Observer composing-room, 55 years old, who used to set type at the same stand with Horace Greeley, and was an intimate friend of both he and William Cullen Bryant, burned in the ruins. Richard S. Davey, an Englishman, a compositor in the Scottish-American office, fell from a fourth-story window; 40 years of age; left leg, left arm and lower jaw fractured, and severe internal injuries. Alfred W. Harris, 38 years old. The assistant foreman of the Observer composing room burned in the building. Mary Blount, New Jersey. Mary O'Connor, city. Mary Smith, city. William Stubbs, photographer, Brooklyn. Three others.

Four weekly newspapers were burned out. The postoffice escaped ignition by closing its iron shutters. Munn & Co., of the Scientific American, lost a large amount of patent models. A. M. Stewart, editor of the Scottish American, was rescued by one of his compositors.

Blaine and the State Department.

Washington dispatches say that the publication of the correspondence between Secretary Blaine and the diplomatic representatives of the United States to Chili and Peru has produced a profound sensation at the national capitol, and may be expected to excite an equal degree of interest in other parts of the world. In this publication is made known for the first time the policy of the State Department in reference to the South American republics—a policy which has been completely reversed since the retirement of Secretary Blaine and the appointment of Secretary Frelinghuysen. Within the space of one month this important change has occurred, and the measures which Blaine originated and set on foot, presumably with the full assent and support of the President, give place to entirely different measures and plans, which have in their turn received the sanction of the President. It is claimed on one side that this change of attitude has averted a war with Chili, which President Arthur believed to be inevitable unless the United States abandoned the role of mediator and protector in the affairs of the South American republics; and on the other side, the friends and supporters of the vigorous measures inaugurated by Secretary Blaine see in this sensational reversal of the policy of pluck and energy a square backdown which will redound neither to the credit nor advantage of the United States as a nation in the eyes of the world.

Mr. Blaine, having been interviewed in Washington, has given his version of certain matters connected with the reigning diplomatic sensation. He pronounces as false and without foundation in truth the assertion that his instructions to Trescott were drafted and forwarded without the knowledge of the President, and states that not only were the instructions fully discussed between the President and himself, but after being written out they were no less than twice submitted to him for criticism and change, and he has in his possession the original draft bearing marks of the modifications desired by the President. Mr. Blaine recalls the fact that the President, in his inaugural message, specifically referred to Trescott's mission and instructions. He promptly acknowledges the right of the President to change his mind and reverse any policy previously agreed upon, but for himself says he can see no reason to take a different view of the wisdom of the prior course marked out. He fears that one result of the change will be the utter destruction of the commercial interests of the United States on the South Pacific coast. In the concluding portion of the interview, Mr. Blaine declares that the spoliation of Peru demanded by Chili is equivalent to the secession of the eleven States in rebellion in the years following 1861, and the loss to the Union of the Pacific States beside. "It amounts," says Mr. Blaine, "to the wholesale destruction of a friendly republic—a destruction as complete and as cruel as the partition of Poland."

PRESIDENT ARTHUR'S VERSION.

A statement is made, on authority traceable directly to the Executive Mansion, which contradicts the assertions of Mr. Blaine in essential particulars. It is stated that the President did not examine or approve the particular draft of instructions sent by Blaine to Trescott, and on the subsequent examination of the correspondence was astonished and alarmed to find that the important modifications ordered by him had not been made, and that the text of the instructions was such as to immediately invite, if not to provoke, a declaration of war by Chili. Upon the discovery of the precise character of Blaine's communication to Trescott the President directed the telegraphing of counter-instructions to ward off the impending mischief, and with the same object in view Secretary Frelinghuysen sought an interview with the Chilian Minister and gave personal assurances that the offensive language employed in Trescott's instructions did not correctly represent the sentiments of the President regarding the affair with Chili.

The President's desire in the whole matter was to protect the dignity of the United States without inviting the hostility of Chili and without endeavoring to act as an aggressive intermeddler in the affairs of other countries. The spirit and letter of Mr. Blaine, if they accomplished the one purpose, could not have done so without inviting the hostility of Chili, if not open war with that country. This, in substance, is the statement of those well informed as to the views of the administration, and it will be seen that this explanation leaves still a very sharp and well-defined issue with Mr. Blaine.

LIVING ON HUMAN FLESH.

Horrible Details of the Crimes of Beckwith, of Alford, Mass.

BOSTON, MASS., Jan. 30.

It is now believed that the murder of Simon A. Vandercook, near the town of Alford, this State, a few weeks ago was the result of the cannibalistic longings of a powerfully built man of fine personal appearance named Beckwith, between 55 and 60 years of age, and weighing something over two hundred pounds. On the day when the constable and posse broke into Beckwith's hut some sickening sights were presented. In the stove were discovered the head, feet and one hand of a human body, charred and blackened by fire. In an adjoining room was found the rest of the body, the trunk split through, several ribs split off, and the entrails taken out and lying in a basket near by. Great slices of flesh had been cut from the arms and legs, and there were evidences of a ghastly and fiendish purpose having been completed.

The theory is, and it is said to be well founded, that Beckwith is a cannibal. It is thought he intended to eat a portion of Vandercook's body, the liver of the victim having been found in his frying-pan and a portion of it gone. The murderer had also, it is said, washed his victim's remains and otherwise prepared them for salting down in a barrel, to serve for a supply of food during the winter. That Beckwith's stomach was not too fastidious for this sort of diet would seem to be implied by the remark of a stage-driver that "Beckwith ate one of his horses that died from disease early this winter."

Some of the people of Alford say they have heard the murderer boast that he had eaten human flesh in Australia, and that he could do it again, if necessary. It is called to mind that an old lady, named Mrs. Willaby Peck, went berrying on the mountains in the vicinity of Beckwith's cabin several years ago, and has never since been seen. At the time of her disappearance 100 men made search for her. Now Beckwith's recent crime gives color to a suspicion that he also murdered this woman, and, perhaps, ate portions of her flesh.

When Beckwith was last in Great Barrington, a few weeks ago, he inquired of one of the butchers whether the latter wished to purchase some pork. When the cabin was reached, soon after the murder, no pork or other provisions of any account could be found, and the startling query now raised among those possessed of vivid imaginations is whether he intended to sell human flesh as pork. Beckwith's cabin has been burned, and it is reported that there has been found beneath the rubbish a subterranean passage, in which it is thought that the remains of 100 persons have been burned.

Know Your Business Thoroughly.

A young man in a leather store used to feel very impatient with his employer for keeping him, year after year, handling hides. But he saw the use years after when in an establishment of his own he was able to tell by the touch the exact quality of the goods. It was only by those thousands of repetitions that the lesson was learned; and so it is with everything in which we acquire skill. The half-informed, the half-skilled, in every business outnumber the others, dozens to one. Daniel Webster once replied to a young man who asked him if there was any room in the legal profession. "There is always room at the top." The better your business, the better your chance to rise. You can gather much information by making a wise use of your eyes and ears, and perhaps be able to surprise your employer in an emergency by stepping into the "next man's" place, and discharging his duties satisfactorily; so, learn your business.

We would guard the young against the use of every word that is not strictly proper. Use no profane expression, allude to no sentence that will put to blush the most sensitive. You know not the tendency of habitually using indecent or profane language. It may never be obliterated from your heart. When you grow up, you may find at your tongue's end some expression which you would not use for any money. It was used when quite young. Good men have been taken sick and become delirious. In these moments they use the most vile, indecent language imaginable. When informed of it after their restoration to health, they had no idea of the pain they had caused. They had learned and repeated the expressions in childhood; and, though years had passed since, they had been indelibly stamped upon the heart. Think of this, you who are tempted to use improper language, and never disgrace yourself or your friends.

The New French Ministry.

M. De Freycinet, President of the Council and Minister of Foreign Affairs.

M. Ferry, President of Public Instruction.

M. Goblet, Minister of the Interior and of Public Worship.

M. Leon Say, Minister of Finance.

M. Varroy, Minister of Public Works.

Gen. Billot, Minister of War.

Admiral Jaureguiberry, Minister of Marine.

M. Tirard, Minister of Commerce.

M. Cochery, Minister of Posts and Telegraphs.

M. De Mahy has accepted the Ministry of Agriculture.

The programme of the new Ministry, as read to the Chamber of Deputies, met with great favor, and the new administration is in a fair way to get along smoothly with the element which put an extinguisher upon Gambetta's flaming ambition. Commencing with the assurance of peace at home and abroad, he announced that the laws relative to the press and to the right of public meeting will be applied in a liberal sense. It is thought best to postpone a revision of the constitution until the next Legislature meets, but the judicial, military and educational reforms already undertaken will be persevered with. An impetus will be given to labor, but there will be no compulsory conversion of the debt or purchase of railways.

The Coal of the Country.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30.

The census office has just published a report on the production of bituminous coal, from which it appears the total amount mined in the United States during the census year 1880 was 42,420,580 tons, of which total 29,942,340 tons were produced in the Appalachian coal field. Allegheny county, Pa., furnished over one-tenth, and the States of Pennsylvania, Illinois and Ohio nearly three-fourths of the entire product. The average price per ton at the mine in 1880 was $1.22, while in 1870 it was $1.92, at a cost of 88 cents. An average of 431 53-100 tons was raised per man and 16.8 per cent. of the year's working time, or about twenty days per man, was idle in strikes. Sufficient information was gathered to justify the assumption that the exhausted fields form but a very small fraction of the total available coal land. Attention is called to the fact that, although the value of the product has fallen, wages have not correspondingly decreased, and the totals prove again nearly a third of a million dollars annually in favor of labor. Anthracite product was 286,649,996 tons, nearly all furnished by the State of Pennsylvania, making the total product of the country for the census year 761,066,576 tons. England produced 746,818,122 tons in the same year.

AUBURN COURIER.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1882.

Senator Fair lives in Charles Sumner's old quarters at Washington. He is the richest man in Congress, and perhaps the richest officeholder in the world. His leisure is devoted to the study of finance.

Potter county, Pennsylvania, is the scene of a novel elopement case, in which a middle-aged woman, who is alleged to have two husbands living, induced a 14-year-old school-boy to run away with her.

The Marquis of Hurtly, who is just now sadly wanted by his money-lender, has ruined himself on the turf. At his majority he came into an estate of 85,000 acres, with a rent-roll of $100,000. He married the daughter of a wealthy banker; yet at only 34 years of age he is in the sore distress of poverty.

During the year 1881 there was published in England a total of 5,406 new books, of which 1,296 were new editions, books already known to the public. This shows a falling off, as compared with the year 1880, of about 300 books, which is attributed to the rapid development of the periodical press.

There is a movement in North Carolina to commemorate the first landing of Englishmen within the limits of the Union. It was about July 4, 1584, that Amidas and Barlowe came to anchor off Roanoke island, and the State Press Association propose to see to it that the event be celebrated on the Independence day of 1884.

The school population of Wisconsin is estimated at 489,142. Of this number, 296,428 during the past year attended the public schools, and 24,624 the private schools. The State has 10,040 public-school teachers, and her school property is valued at $5,543,049.61. The receipts for school purposes last year were $2,851,698.48, and her expenditures $2,303,038.34.

It is fortunate, says an exchange, that Mr. Oscar Wilde arrived here when he did, for we are now threatened with a visitation from another noodle who is much more utterly utter than the advocate of the dado now in New York. The new calamity is a Marquis de Lenville, who laces, pads and poses, and wears a romantic Byron lock, and a beard that trails esthetically in all directions. Instead of being soulful and abstract, like Wilde, he is said to be beefy and cheeky. As long as we have to endure these cranks, let us have a full-fledged one.

Five hundred locomotives were built in the three Paterson establishments during the past year, worth upward of $5,000,000. The price ranges from $6,000 to $14,000 according to size and character. This is the largest number ever turned out in Paterson in any one year. The business was conducted entirely on a cash basis. The prices obtained were very much lower than in former years, and the profits correspondingly less, but the losses were also much below the average, in consequence of the cash policy pursued. Fully 600 locomotives will be completed in the same city this year.

The lecture room of the Louisville Medical College is in the form of an amphitheater, the seats rising rapidly. A free-mannered Texan student in the highest row put his foot on the shoulder of a Kentuckian next in front. The Kentuckian resented the familiarity, and they went out in an alley to fight, the rest of the class accompanying them. Strange to say, the affair was not decided with six-shooters. The rules of pugilism were enforced by a referee, and thirty-two rounds fought in about an hour, when the vanquished Kentuckian was carried to a physician's office for treatment. The victorious Texan may now probably rest his feet just where he pleases.

Capt. Tyson, of the Polaris, has become a convert to Commander Cheyne's plan of reaching the North pole by balloon. He contends that there is no probability the pole can ever be reached by sailing there, and that this is the only mode left. He therefore is of opinion that if a balloon properly equipped were started from some station in the high latitudes in May when the wind was blowing northward, it might reach the pole in time to return in the autumn. He advises the carrying of a light boat to be used in case open water is found, and says eight months' provision can be taken in the balloon. The question is not whether the pole can be reached, but what is the use of reaching it? Suppose the balloon gets there, and that its voyagers return in safety, what then? What good will they have done? What useful purpose will they have accomplished during the six months of darkness and icy imprisonment? It is not at all unlikely that the balloon will start, and that there will be found men ready to go, but why? Have not lives enough been lost, has not money enough been sunk, on these vain, purposeless journeys?

Ex-President Hayes had his attention called the other day to an article attributing to his wife the sole authorship of the temperance legislation of the White House. He declared that this was untrue. "We mutually agreed," he said to a correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer, "before my inauguration, that the habits and customs of our private life should not be changed. We had never been in the habit of offering wine to our guests in our own house, and determined not to do so in the White House. During my whole term this rule was violated upon only one occasion; that was at the dinner given in honor of the Grand Duke Alexis, and that was Secretary Evarts' dinner, given, according to custom, at my house, and paid for by me. Mr. Evarts came to me a day or two before the dinner and said, 'Mr. President, are we going to have wine at the diplomatic dinner?' to which I simply referred to our well-known domestic policy. The Secretary urged that it was his dinner, and that I ought to yield, which I did—that one time, and only that time."

In the pocket of a drunkard who died a few days ago in the city prison of San Francisco was found a curious document purporting to be in brief the autobiography of a man who began active life with more than the usual share of ambition and glory. In the worn and almost illegible page was found the following description of the famous charge at Balaklava, the writer at the age of 16 having apparently been one of the immortal Six Hundred: "The bugles rang out their shrill calls to charge, and we went right at the center of our foes. The shock was a fearful one. As we struck against the enemy a Muscovite cavalryman, with a look as black as hate on his face and his eye blazing, aimed his lance at my heart. I parried his blow and struck his weapon down, and then dispatched him. But it must have been from him I received a wound, for at night I found my left boot full of blood, and a lance wound right under the knee-cap. In striking down his lance, the point of it entered my leg, but in the excitement of the moment it passed unnoticed. I never could tell how we ever broke through the Russian lines, but we did. When we appeared on the other side I came to my senses. Then we met another line of the enemy, but our spirits were up and we passed through them like a sheet of lightning. It was a terrific work, and our troops suffered heavily. That wound under the knee-pan was all I received during the bloody work of the Crimean campaign. It fires me up a little, even now, when I think of those times, just like an old war-horse at the sound of a trumpet; but I don't think I would care to see or go through them again. I went into that charge a private and came out a corporal, beside receiving two distinguishing marks for bravery and good conduct.

Response to a Toast on Women.

Mr. President, I think the most sensible thing ever done in the world was the making of woman. It ought to have been done before it was. I presume that Adam, when the rib was taken out of him, thought it was pretty rough. He did not know what was going to become of him. But when the job was done and woman was sent down, and the meat put on in the right place, I am satisfied that he looked upon the job and said it was the boss. I say it should have been done before. The idea of Adam's remaining there all those years alone, without any one to welcome him home from Scotch banquets, and to ask him why he didn't stay out all night, and come home smelling like a smoke house? I can imagine Adam going to the grocery after codfish, and building fires himself, and cooking his own meals in the bachelor's hall. It has struck me that it would not be out of place for the legislature to pass resolutions of thanks for the making of woman. It is to be hoped that they will attend to it this season. If woman hadn't been made at that time, I am satisfied that a great many of us would not have been here to-night. If it had not occurred to the Almighty to make woman, I don't believe the Republicans could have got 15,000 majority in this state to-day. Women are "the boss." I don't know as I can explain it, but the most of you know how it is yourselves. There isn't a man who hasn't felt the electric influence of woman—when taken across her knee, or when in love. It beats all. Some of you probably know more than I about woman, though I have been exposed more or less. The highest ambitions of man are stimulated by love of woman. There is hardly anything good or noble that man does but what he receives his inspiration from woman. And in everything of that kind that we do, it is for the benefit of woman—of mothers, wives sisters, cousins—I won't go any farther than cousins, because they are the darlingest of all.

Every man has a guiding star, and a cousin makes a good star to look up to. It is good that it is so; and the lovelier guiding star he has the better. The man who has a pure good woman to feel proud of him, and love him, is indeed a happy man, and he can work harder, enjoy his work better, and be nobler if he knows there is one that he is responsible to for every thought—one whom he loves till his heart gets in a few extra beats when he thinks of her, and one who considers him "the boss." And all of you have such dear ones gazing on you always.—Peck's Sun.

The firmest friendships have been formed in mutual adversity, as iron is most strongly united by the fiercest flame.

ZEKE'S MAD RIDE.

[From the Philadelphia Times.]

Zeke was thought to be the dunce of the family. He wasn't dull exactly, but because of his quiet ways and his love of sleep he got to be known as the most backward of the bright Burnwell boys. Zeke was so lazy that he couldn't count, though twelve years of age. When, along about noon, his father would say: "Run, Zeke, and tell me what time it is," Zeke would look at the clock and remark: "Little hand's a stickin' straight up!" One day Jerry, the black man, made fun of Zeke, saying: "G'lang wid ye, ye do'an know yer foot from a hole in de ground; g'way from heah an larn to count up yer A B C's." What Jerry said made the lad feel ashamed. That night he covered his head with a quilt, and said to himself that he wished a bugaboo would catch him by the toes and take him to the bad place.

As he was feeding the horses next morning he asked his friend Joe, the stableman, how he could learn to count. Joe laughed and winked at a big horse named Bob. "Why, you pester you, why don't you get up onto Bob's back and count them air hairs in his mane?" That made Zeke's blood feel hot in his face. "All right," he said, and bounding from the hay-mow he lighted upon Bob's back. Bob was taken by surprise. He wasn't in the habit of having boys on his back at breakfast, so he started on a wild run. If Zeke couldn't count he could ride a horse as a swallow rides the air. Away went Bob out the lane and up the country road. Zeke grasped a handful of the mane and began to pick out the black threads.

"One, two, three, four, five—" but just as he was about to say six a violent jerk of the horse's head drew the mane from his hand. Nothing daunted, however, the boy began again. Bob was running up the road at full speed.

"Ha! ha!" hallooed a man by the roadside, "what are you doin'?"

"Countin' hairs," said Zeke.

"What a little fool!" exclaimed the man; "he might as well try to number the hairs of my head, but before he could get through with his job every hair would be gray."

But the dashing horse and his bold rider were out of hearing and out of sight. They went steadily on for nearly an hour. Zeke had counted a thousand and Bob's run had dropped into a swift trot.

"Hold on," said a gentleman whom they met on the bridge; "where are you going to without saddle or bridle?"

"Counting the hairs of the horse's mane," replied Zeke, never looking up.

"Why don't you count the hairs of his tail?" roared the gentleman, with much merriment; but on sped Bob with Zeke bending closely over his neck.

Soon afterward the frightened horse came to the Schuylkill River. Into the water he trotted, and soon he was swimming for the other shore. This Zeke had not expected. The shock of the cold water caused him to forget his count, and he was obliged to cling to the mane to save his life. "Anyhow," Zeke said, "I find the mane of some use." When Bob reached the other bank he kept on as madly as before, but seeing that his rider was more than a match for him, he at last stopped short and began to turn the head toward Zeke. Meanwhile Zeke had given over his attempt to count the hairs of the mane. What he was thinking about was how he could procure a bridle. His hands still grasped the hairs, which felt so smooth and strong that the lad decided to try and make a bridle out of them. With his jackknife he succeeded in cutting off several strands, which he tied and twisted together in a clumsy fashion. A stick of crooked oak, whittled smoothly, served as a bit. Zeke looked with pride upon his odd pieces of harness, and he was delighted when Bob, responding to a pull of the rein, trotted off homeward. That night Zeke ate his supper in pain in bed, but the strange adventure so worked upon his mind that it resulted in good. He applied himself to his books, and now he is professor in one of the best colleges of the country.

How Lace Paper is Made.

Lace paper is one of those things over which some people can afford to be romantic. It is the opposite of wrapping paper, at all events. However, here is what a Belgium paper has to say on the subject: "Who of us has not admired those fine outlines and wondrous paper arabesques which cover the smallest box of confectionery, and make the contents a hundred times more appetizing? A bouquet with its pretty collar of lace, a casket with its band of guipure, or a fine roast leg of mutton with a goffered sleeve—all seem to take on a new charm, so true is it that sometimes the manner in which an object is presented is better than the present itself. There are very few manufacturers of lace paper, and these almost exclusively in France and Germany. It dates only within the last fifty years, like so many other articles of luxury. Confectioners and pastry cooks, of course make great use of it; but butchers are now putting their choicest joints in lace paper. Then horticulturists, florists and cigar manufacturers employ it. A proof of the extension of the manufacture may be formed from the fact that, while not more than 100,000 francs' worth was turned out in Paris some thirty years ago, it is now sold to the yearly value of from 600,000 to 700,000 francs. It is exported all over the world, but principally to North and South America. Next in order come England, Spain, Italy, Russia, Austria, etc. The material is rather costly, and the paper has to be specially prepared by rubbing each sheet on both sides with soap powder, so that they may easily separate. Eight sheets are put on the matrix, and then the work girl beats with a small hammer until the design is cut out. Thirty blows are necessary to cut ten square centimeters. Efforts have been made to cut the paper with one stroke, but they have been unsuccessful, and the little lead hammers have to be retained. The little boxes for fruits and terrines, etc., are made, however, by machinery, but only within the last four years; and as they are fifty per cent. cheaper a great many of them are sold."

Flowers in Sleeping-Rooms.

The public are again warned against the use of flowers in sleeping apartments, and wonderful stories are told of the deleterious effects which have followed their presence in a limited atmosphere respired by invalids. Curious enough, these appalling "instances" of the evil influences of plants do not for the most part apply to flowers. Nevertheless we agree that it is safe to banish growing plants and flowers from bedrooms. They can do no good, and they may do some harm.—London Lancet.

Baiting With Minnows.

For a long time Mr. Furness studied upon some plan to crush the milkman and make him acknowledge the fraud he had been practicing for months, and at last an idea struck him. He hunted up his son's fish pole and started for the lake, and after some three hours of patient fishing on the Government breakwater returned home with half a dozen perch, that would average about four inches in length, and placed them in the aquarium. Then he told the hired girl to be sure and call him early enough in the morning so that he could go out and get the milk when the milkman came along. He said he wanted to see the milkman particularly, on business, and she said she would be sure and call him, and she did. About seven o'clock there was a rush of wheels, the jangle of a bell and the milkman was at the door. Mr. Furness seized the pitcher and then rushed to the aquarium. Only three of the fish were alive, the others having died during the night. Mr. Furness seized the live ones, thrust them into the pitcher and rushed out. By holding the pitcher pretty high up, the milkman was prevented from seeing what was in it, and he poured in the milk, all unconscious of the trap that was laid. Mr. Furness then handed over the milk ticket and said, it beat all what weather we were having this fall. The milkman said he never saw such weather since the fall of '47, when there was a period of seven weeks that the sun never shone.

"For goodness sake, my friend," said Mr. Furness, "what on earth is in this milk?"

"I don't know, I'm sure," said the milkman; "let's see." And he bent over and looked into the pitcher.

"Why, it's something alive!" exclaimed Mr. Furness.

"Here," said the milkman, "let's pour it out." And he took the top off a milk can and held it while Mr. Furness poured out the contents of the pitcher.

"Fish, by the Lord Harry!" said the astonished milkman.

"Well, I should say fish!" ejaculated Mr. Furness, indignantly, and looking at the milkman in a searching manner. "What does it mean?"

"I'm blessed if I know," said the poor milkman, helplessly.

"Well, I'm sure I don't," said Mr. Furness.

There was a long pause, and then Mr. Furness said:

"I want you to tell me candidly, now, just how much water you put in your milk, and whether you put in anything else besides water."

"Well, you see, sometimes I am a little short. When I have milk enough to go around to all my customers I don't put in any water; but when I have sale for—well say—a hundred quarts, and only have ninety or ninety-five quarts of milk—well, I can't afford to lose my customers, you know."

"Are you short very often?" Mr. Furness asked.

"Well, no—not very often," and the man blushed and moved uneasily on the seat.

"I see the subject is becoming painful," said Mr. Furness, stiffly, "and I will not pursue it further. But don't you think that hereafter you can furnish me with a little purer article of milk, and we will let by-gones be by-gones."

"Yes, sir. I think I can."

They bade each other good morning, and ever since then the milk furnished the Furness family has been almost pure cream.—Peck's Sun.

A Desperate Battle.

Danville, Va., Feb. 1.

A desperate, novel and fatal battle took place on the plantation of William Lanier, Pittsylvania county, between Thomas King, one of Mr. Lanier's tenants, and King's mother, on the one side, and George Slate and wife, hirelings of Mr. King, on the other. A complication of circumstances led to the difficulty, but it was mainly Slate's aggressive temper and his refusal to deal squarely about some property he had found and refused to advertise. Slate left King's employment and came back to demand his wages. Finding King in his stable, Slate drew a pistol and told him he would shoot him if he came out of there without bringing with him the disputed property. King called to his mother to bring him his shotgun. The old lady was approaching with the gun in one hand and a cane in the other. Slate, seeing this, told his wife, who was with him, to knock the old woman in the head. The old lady was thrown by the younger female, when Mr. King came running to the aid of his mother. Slate fired at him but missed. A desperate struggle ensued, in which all four were engaged. King secured the gun and shot Slate in the thigh. Slate's wife then got hold of the gun and knocked King senseless, when Slate himself drew a knife and stabbed him in eight places. Meantime the old lady had been seriously cut and beaten, and a large piece bitten out of her arm by the female. It was a desperate life-and-death struggle. All four of the combatants were covered with gore, and fought until they had to cease from loss of blood. When neighbors came on the scene they found King and his mother dying and Slate terribly mangled, so that life is despaired of. The wife was painfully hurt, but it is thought not fatally.

An elephant was knocked down the other day at Sheriff's sale for $7,000. This is considered very low, and as the price may advance in a few days it behooves poor families to purchase their winter's stock of elephants now.—New York Herald.

Teacher: "Feminine of friar?" First bright boy: "Hasn't any." Teacher: "Next." Second bright boy: "Nun." Teacher: "That's right." First bright boy indignantly ejaculates: "That's just what I said."

AUBURN, IND., FEB'Y. 9, 1882.

THE Stalwarts have had a bronze medal struck, with the legend "301" to note the number who voted for Grant at the Chicago convention.

GEN. THOMAS J. BRADY, of star route fame, has disposed of his interest in the National Republican, a paper printed in Washington, to W. A. Patton, of N. Y. city.

THE New England and Middle states were subjected to a severe snow storm, last Sunday. At Carbondale, Pa., a depth of thirty six inches was reported. Trains were delayed several hours on account of the great snow fall.

—THE democracy of New York city are making earnest efforts to unite the different factions of the party in that place, and hope by this course to overthrow the influence of John Kelley in the democratic party in their state.

REPUBLICANS do not seem to think the national debt should be paid off, but that at least a thousand millions be allowed to remain unpaid, so that the national banks may have bonds to use as banking capital. Study this over.

POTATOES, celery and cabbages are now brought over from Europe and sold in New York and other sea board cities at prices lower than those demanded by home producers. Now, these latter demand a protective tariff, of course.

IT is thought by the Warden at the Washington jail and others who have watched Guiteau during his long and tedious trial, that he will not live to expiate his crime upon the gallows. He is said to have given upall hope and to be failing very fast.

IT has been suggested that Guiteau's body be publicly exhibited for purposes of speculation. His relatives denounce such a proposition as inhuman and as something to which they will never consent. Prominent lawyers have given it as their opinion that the government will control the disposition of the body. It is probable, however,that the remains will be delivered to Guiteau's relatives.

—Charles Landis, a worthy young man of this city,aged about 21, met with a horrible death last Monday afternoon while assisting to splice a belt in the basement of the Noble School Furniture and Oval Churn factory. He was aiding Frank Spangler. As Spangler was tying the belt he heard Landis cry out, "Frank, cut the belt," and he immediately did so, but too late to save, for Landis was already fast in the main shaft, Spangler at once gave the alarm and the engine was stopped, but not till life had been crushed out of the young man. The shaft makes 190 revolutions a minute, and had the steam been shut off on the spot the life could not have been saved. Both legs were torn off and the body horribly mangled. The deceased was a young man of great promise and universally respectd. He was a member of Triumph Hose No. 3. The remains were attended to their last resting place by a large number of friends yesterday.—Goshen Times.

A LATE number of the Butler Record finds fault with those democratic papers that commend Grant for his recent course in the Fitz John Porter case, and Orth in his attempting to weaken the power of the speaker of the house. The Record goes on to say: "It is not the principle that these journals are commending, but they are willing to favor anything that savors of jobbery." If Grant is willing to acknowledge that he made a mistake in taking sides against Porter, we would like to know what "jobbery" there is in that. If Orth opposes the action of Speaker Keifer in appointing committees that are intensely partisan and intensely republican, we fail to see any "jobbing" in his actions. If there is, any jobbery in cutting down the increasing power of the speaker, or in meting out tardy justice to an officer who has been, according to all accounts, falsely accused, we would like to have it explained. Democratic editors have given publicity to these two instances of a republican sense of justice, for the reason that their occurrence is like angels' visits—few and far between.

Blaine had, while he was secretary of state, worked up a feeling in favor of a general conference or congress of all the American powers, a plan similar to that practiced by the nations of Europe. Garfield favored the plan, but his assassination and final death put an end to the matter at the time. Then Blaine revived the scheme and with Arthur's consent, sent a circular to all the South American states and to Mexico inviting them to join in a congress for the purpose of preserving peace amog the nations on this continent. The plan was, no doubt, intended by Blaine himself as personal buncombe, but would have done no harm if carried out. Just as soon, however, as Blaine's successor, Freinghuysen, got into office he had the president rescind the order, or rather stop all further action in the matter. Now Blaine comes to the front with a public letter to the president, in which he complains that the latter has changed his mind, and refuses to call the proposed meeting from fear that it would be distasteful to the European powers. It places Arthur in a rather unpleasant predicament. But Blaine out of office, is not Blaine in office, and no doubt Arthur will go on and carry out any policy he pleases. And the people care but little whether Blaine's Bismark policy is introduced in American policies or not.

No. 6, Butler township, at the early age of seventeen. Now he has a good position in what promises to be a first-class institution of learning. This is certainly a very gratifying success.

—On Friday evening,at New Carlisle, while the Rev. Mr. Tuck, of the Christian Church, was preaching, a young man who gave his name as Arthur Thomas, came forward to the mourner's bench. After the close of the meeting, he remained and confessed himself a professional burglar of two years experience, and that he came to that town to blow several safes, naming the proprietors. He was arrested by the sheriff and lodged in jail, where he made a more chmplete confession.

Neighborhood Notes.

—Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Strauss, accompanied by their daughter Annie and Mr Henry Kahn, left for Chicago Monday morning, to complete arrangements for that grand wedding which is to take place the first week in March.—Lagrange Banner.

—Bryan Press: "There is a grand, good chance to get an extension of the Columbus & Lima railroad. Unless I have been misinformed by those who ought to know, that road will strike the state line somewhere in Williams county within a year and a half."

—Reading claims to do more business than any other town between Jackson and Ft. Wayne. Angola, Waterloo and Auburn will contest this claim.—(Ft. Wayne Gazette. Angola does a great deal more in the way of trade than any of the other towns named.—Angola Journal.

—While at Reading, last Friday, we took a look through the big tannery where the buffalo hides are tanned. It is a busy, as well as a striking place, and affords employment to a large force of hands. The pay-roll is about $1,000 per week. Company now have on hand about 40,000 untanned robes.—Angola Republican.

The Lagrange Democrat has had the following experience: Our Sanctum was invaded this week by an individual who desired to settle with some quill driver. Knew not whom, when or whither. We called court, proved ourself innocent and consequently the Democrat arrives on time.

—Byron E. Merritt, who has been treasuer of the Elkart Car Works, Co., since its recent organization, has sold out his interest to Samuel S. Shutt, of DeKalb county, and will again mingle with Bristolites as of yore. Sooner or later you see, they all "come marching home." We welcome Byron and hope much future success in store for him. —Bristol Banner,

—A hen killed not long since by Danford Ward, of Jamestown township, contained an egg about six inches in diameter, and perfectly shaped. The hen had been unable to walk but a few feet at the time, and her enormous size led to the killing in order that her ailment might be found out. There were seven layers in the egg, and after each layer was a thin shell. In addition to this large one several smaller eggs were fond in the hen. This information comes from a reliable source, ond though it is a remarkable story it may be relied upon. The hen was of the large Brama kind. Had the egg been preserved it would be quite a curiosity.—Angola Journal.

—Samuel Raymond, of Tarrytown, N. Y., has written Adjutant Gen. Smith that while on a visit recently to Sanlesbury, N. C., where one of the rebel prison pens was located during the war, he found in the hands of an old colored man a Bible, upon the fly leaf of which was "G. W. Hart, Co. C. 100th Ohio, taken prisoner on the 8th of Sept., 1863, paroled on the 7th of March, 1864." Mr. Raymond writes to obtain information of Mr. Hart, with a view to sending this "historic trifle." We learn from Wm. E Stough that G. W. Hart served with him in Co. C, 100th Ohio O. V. I., and now lives at West Unity, this county. Mr. Hart will undoubtely take steps to secure this valuable relic. —Bryan Press.

—A Valparaiso lady, being sociably inclined, went out calling a few weeks since, and the first place at which she stopped she found that small-pox was in the neighborhood. This was not very pleasant news and so she abandoned the idea of making other calls in that locality, consequently returned home. A few days afterward she concluded to pay a visit to a friend, and upon her arrival she was informed that a member of the family had the scarlet fever, but made her visit, however, and but a few days sice made her third call at the house of anothr neighbor where she found two of the inmates down with whooping cough. Our caller is at present in good health with the hope of remaining so.—Porter County Viddette.

Last Tuesday Dr. J. H. Ford. Secretary of the Wabash County Board of Health, visited North Manchester in his official capacity to verify the reports of a spread of smallpox in that town. His worst fears were realized. He ordered the closing of the churches and public meetings of all kinds and cautioned the citizens against unnecessarily exposing themselves to the fearful malady. Since the last issue of the Plain Dealer two cases have termininated fatal, and it is the belief of Dr. Ford that fully one hundred people have been exposed to this loathsome disease. Extraordinary precaution has been taken to prevent the spread of the disease, but from the present outlook it seems quite probable that North Manchester is to be thoroughly scourged.—Wabash Plain Dealer.

SEED.

THE LARGEST IN THE WORLD.

CORN AND WATERMELONS.

CORN. Our "GIANT" Corn is a new and distinct variety, and is withal the best that any farmer ever grew. The grains are as large as the average size chestnut; the finest white dent ever grown; full, rich in starch, perfect hardy, and never failing to grow a strong and vigorous stalk, with firm, deep roots. The ears are uniform and of very large size. It will yield more than any other variety that can be raised, averaging from THREE to SIX EARS to the stalk. It is taking the place of all other varieties upon its first trial. It is matured, and can be gathered in TEN WEEKS, and grows as successfully in the North as the South.

WATERMELONS. Our "MIXON" Watermelons are the largest and finest in the World in every instance, and grow in any section of the country. Their average weight is from 75 to 125 POUNDS. The flesh is of a blood-red, very solid, luscious, crisp and sugary—far surpassing all other varieties, and, although a melon of such an enormous weight, there is barely half an inch rind. They are pronounced the finest shipping melon in the World. It will pay any farmer to try a sample package.

Corn—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00, and $5.00 per bushel. Watermelons—Sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00. Address all orders to the ACME IMPORTING CO.

He intends to remain in the west two or three years, believing that a sojourn in that part of the country, will be a benefit to Mrs. Downs, whose health has not been good for a number of years. Mr. Downs was one of our most reliable and intelligent farmers, and we regret to lose him from our county.

—We regret that we received too late last week, the manuscript of the celebration of Uncle Jerry Rhodes' golden wedding. Following are some additional facts which become detached from the copy: Jerimiah Rhodes, born March 6, 1807, in Ross Co., O; Ann J. Flemming born April 19, 1815, in same county, and were married at Clarksburgh, O. The presents received were $90 in gold, gold headed cane, silver cake basket, napkin rings and butter-knife, and many other articles, —The introduction of large manufacturing establishments into our town is the one thing needed to promote its growth and wealth and develop, the natural resources of the county. There has been a considerable talk lately about the establishment of a large wagon manufactory here, with a capacity of employment for 150 men. This would add from five to eight hundred to our population, besides increasing largely the trade of our merchants. It is an enterprise that ought to receive the encouragement of all our town people and we understand that with proper inducement and encouragement the enterprise can be secured.

Board of Health.

We publish on our first page the full text of the rules, adopted by the county board of health at their meeting last week. It appears that some action like this was necessary to induce those who had not yet been vaccinated to attend to the matter, and as the board has been quite lenient as to the time, we trust all will see how reasonable their action is, and have their children vaccinated before the given time expires. It seems to be not so much the intention of the board to force measures as to give sound advice as to what has now become a necessity. Small pox is daily coming nearer, and is in many instances proving unusually fatal. A great many children throughout the county, have been vaccinated and it is to be hoped that others will follow.

STRANGE RUNAWAY!—Last Thursday Mr. J. Swander, of Richland, was hauling wood, and on coming to the house with a load, hitched his team and left them a few minutes. They became frightened by some boards blowing down and started off for a wild run. They jumped a fence and took the the loaded wagon over with them and running into the barn yard, the tongue of the wagon came down and was plunged up to the evener in a frozen manure pile. Here the horses fell, one of them breaking his harness. It took hard pulling for the team to pull the tongue out of the pile. Fortunately no serious damage was done.

—The New Orleans Minstrels will appear at Ensley's hall, Feb. 13. This is said to be a first-class company and no doubt, will be greeted with a crowded house. The Daily Journal, at Ithaca N. Y. says: The New Orleans Minstrels gave their second performance in Ithaca last evening to a large and well pleased audiance. We characterise it one of the cleanest and most meritorious given upon this stage. Considered as musical and funny entertainment it was very enjoyable. The burnt cork features of the second part were natural, fresh and free from smut or doubble entendre. The persons composing the company are musicians and aspire to gentility on the stage in preference to skating close to the lines of indecency for the edification of the back seats in the hall. The organization merits full houses and warm applause wherever it goes.

—The Butler Record, of last week, fears we endorse Scovill's ideas of the Guiteau case because we published a part of his speech, and proceeds to go into a spasm of righteous indignation over the matter. Why bless your heart Brother Dodge, we often publish such things as railroad accidents, destructive fires, small pox and mismanagement and corruption of republican officials. But does it follow therefore, that we are in favor of railroad smash ups, incendiarism, small pox or republicanism? We hope not. The fact is, newspapers ought to be, in part at least, devoted to news, and the Record must not be surprised if something of the kind should happen in the COURIER. Brother Dodge must not set himself up as a chronic objector to such things, or as a general censor of the DeKalb Co. press. If he does, he will find the ground already occupied and the claim staked out.

—The Garrett Herald says: "Supt Barns was in Garrett one day last week and visited our schools, but failed to speak of the matter in his paper. Why is this thus?" The omission was not intended as a slight, for the Garrett schools are in a splendid condition, and we feel that the people of that place ought to be, and no doubt are, proud of them. The fact that the school is in competent hands, is of itself a guaranty that they will be well managed. C. M. Merica and his assistants, T. S. Merica, Miss Mills and Miss Dolan are doing a good work. But the truth is, Bro. Powell, we find so many good schools, with now and then at rare intervals a poor one, that to notice them all in the COURIER would crowd out everything else.

—As all physicians and accouchers are required by law to report all births, deaths and contagious diseases to this boartd once a month, I would be glad if they would immediately register so that I may legally supply them with blanks and circulars necessary. I am only authorised to furnished to those who register in the county Clerk's office in accordance with the law.

J. B. CASEBEER, Sec'y.

To avoid any misapprehension, notice is hereby given that Mr. Geo. B. Zimmerman, has charge of my Fire Insurance Agency business, in connection with his agency, and will call on my patrons before their policies expire, and I wish for him the kind treatment and liberal patronage in the future. Insure with Geo. B. Zimmerman. Office over Schaab & Beugnot's.

—B. Goodman has some splendid brass dog collars with rings attached that look attractive. They can be purchased of Mr. Clark, trustee of Keyser and of Mr. Kutzner, trustee of Union townships, for from 15 to 20 cents each.

—When a newspaper does not rebuke all evil by which the community is surrounded, it is but little consequence to its patrons.

—Mace Long, who tells public audiences that he has been the worst "pill" ever tramped American soil, is lecturing in Lagrange county.

—The case of small pox reported to be in T. D. Gross' family, has turned out to be the chicken pox. Auburn has not had a case of small pox or varioloid this winter. People should be more careful in circulating such rumors until they are acquainted with the facts.

—The two papers at Hot Springs have been consolidated, and are now called the Star-Sentinel. Tom. Mays will be employed on the editorial staff.

"Honesty is the best policy," says a south end boy. That may be true, but when a dead beat strikes you for a loan a square shaped lie is the best policy.

—Slim Jim's "pay-car" came near running over the local editor of the Republican Tuesday. Shad should put on the brakes while going over crossings.

—While smoking a pipe that was partly filled with powder, Charley Cotrell, at Newville, had his mustache, eye brows and lashes singed off. Moral: Smoke cigarettes.

—The south end was made lively Saturday night by the frantic yells of several young ladies, accompanied by an enthusiastic dialogue between two Thomas cats, in the back ground.

—Mr. John Miller, at one time Sheriff of this county, and who numbers back among the pioneer settlers that endured the hardships of early life, was buried at Newville, last Friday.

—Ladies are notified not to wear their membrandt hats (called flare-ups for brevity) to the Minstrels Monday night. The back-seat brigade intend to fire them out. A word to the wise, etc.

—Mrs. Johnnie Spacht was again called to the assistance of her mother, Mrs. Wm. Lowry, last Friday. I am sorry to hear that the friends of Mrs. Lowry have but little encouragement of her recovery

—The fellow who goes over the Rhine Saturday evenings, will do well to remember that in the back yard stays an imported blood hound, with "blood in his eye and gore in his jaws."

—The candidates for town elections are beginning to crawl out of their holes, and men that "did'nt know" you lived in town a month ago, now grasp you by the hand and inquire about the health of the whole family.

—I see the professional base ball nines are organizing, and Os. Allen should wake up to the interests of Auburn, and pick his nine. The "Haw Eaters" of Newville, will probably add Billy Little to their club the coming summer.

—A man giving his name as Wm. Johnson, presented a note at the First National Bank with Mr. Lawhead as security and drew out a $1,000. The transaction has proved to be a forgery, with the rascal two months in lead of the officers.

—There does not seem to be so much anxiety on the part of the average office aspirant for the marshalship. The board withdrawing the salary from our present marshal has made the office of little value. The marshal should receive pay for his time.

—The boss of the Republican office has passed a resolution "that no smoking shall be allowed during working hours." He says they take up too much time lighting pipes. I have heard of bosses going out of back windows, and taking the sash along with them.

—A. P. Foltz has surveyed the thing, looked over the ground, and come to the conclusion that it was a wife he wanted. Accordingly he asked a Miss Pepple to "cling to 'im," and she answered, "yea, Adolphos," and last Thursday night they started down the stream of life. I smoked to their joy and comfort.

—As the winter wears away and joyful spring approaches the distant murmur of marriage bells are heard and the fragrant scent of orange blossoms is wafted by Hymeneal wings through the frosty air. All indicates that some will get married and settle down. There are a few, just a few, that would do better to stay single and "settle up."

—An advocate "in the army of the Lord" asked me to publish the names of some boys and girls who behaved badly during protracted meetings. I don't propose to do any such a thing. I would like to see every boy and girl endeavor to do right, educate their heads and hearts, and be able to determine good from evil, learn that which is wise and that which is foolish, love what is good and hate evil; but I see no advantage derived by publishing their names in a newspaper, just because they acted a little improper during an excited revival. "Boys are boys," and while they are full of glee and high spirits their little hearts mean no particular wrong. Time will remedy the matter much better than to make them blush under the public finger of scorn.

—This month is short and when it is ended, dead and gone forever, the first month of spring dawns upon us. The present winter has been so open that it afforded no amusement in the way of sleigh riding, making the season a long, monotonous one, and all are anxiously looking for the spring time with its golden sunshine and wealth of flowers, the music of the birds and the beautiful fragrance of the orchard blossoms. Come, gentle spring, come.

—I had a young man count some paper for me the other day, and when he had finished I asked how many quires he had? "Seven quires and twenty-eight papers," he replied. Something wrong about that, Doc, I said, but he stood as firm as a balky mule hitched to a stump puller. After a long, convincing argument he finally agreed that he had counted the last four papers twice. This is a warning to young men of the "smart aleck" order. You see it's no trouble to explain these things, if you light up the mystery of nature with the lamp of reason and intelligence.

—A south end "professor," who borrows his reading matter, criticized one of my four-line items very thoroughly, last week. I did'nt pen the squib because I thought it was cute; neither did I write it for any-one to read who was not a subscriber to the COURIER. The "Prof." is what I term an artificial man, and, of course, his opinion on any matters would have but little weight upon me. He perhaps has no idea that but that every little item should be in the language of Webster and surrounded with historical facts. Now, "Prof.," take this advise while I hold you by the ear: Keep mum in the future, or otherwise I will shake you up as thoroughly as a peanut dealer does a red glass of lemonade.

"A little nonsense now and then
Is relished by the wisest men,"

—The old Swineford House, standing on the corner of Van Buren and Ninth streets, presents a sad and forlorn appearance. The windows have been broken and many other signs of neglect are visible. I can hardly realize that but a few years ago this old, worn and haggard looking structure was the popular hotel of our now industrious and thriving town. To the inhabitants of ten or fifteen years ago, who seated themselves by the bar-room fireside when the building stood boldly and prominently where the spacious brick is now located, have been entirely forgotten. The many jokes and tales that were recited on Sundays have left their memory, together with the comforts and enjoyment they recived within the inner walls of the old Swineford. To-day upon the same street I noticed one of her former visitors, who, I am sorry to say, has gone side by side with this hotel down the rugged path of life. Once lively, bright and useful, but now the picture of sorrow, sadness and pity. This man, but a few years ago, was an industrious mechanic, and possessed all the advantages of natural art to enable him to be master of his trade; but his habits led him astray, and the time is rapidly approaching when he will wend his way over the hill to the poor house. These thoughts are sad, but true, and if my mind's eye deceives me not, I know of several young men, now in the bloom of manhood, who are following in the foot steps of the above old veteran, slowly but surely, and their ending will be the same.

—The few sunshiny days of the week past I have noticed that the street masher made it a point to get in his "dirty work" with the female gender of the town. I am surprised to notice some of Auburn's fairest daughters, and of respectable families, flirt on the public highway with this class of frail humanity. I had occasion to step into the home of one of these girls last Saturday. She was at the fireside engaged in reading a magazine, and the mother in the kitchen putting life and vim into an ordinary mop. While I love to see young ladies have literary taste, I also like to see them have some domestic attainments, and for the benefit of those who are annoyed by the dead beat, dead busted masher, I will give a receipe, which, at least, will serve as a temporary cure, if not a permanent one: The lady has only to cast her eye modestly down and fix her gaze intently on the feet of the masher. The glance should be concentrated, yet full of pity, and should deepen as the lady passes by. Instantly the masher is affected with a profound disgust—the sympathetic look strikes terror to his soul, and he casts down his eyes and looks upon his own feet. The horrible fear that his shoes are not in the latest style takes possession of his bosom. He is shaken with the conviction that his foot is abnormally spacious, and that something has gone wrong with the set of his trousers at the ankle. The stoutest la-da-dah collapses at the mere possibility of such a thing—his nerve is gone, his arms lose their kimbo, and he feels that his pantloons are bagged at the knees, and suspects the cleanliness of his stockings. He will fly to some secluded spot and make a protracted investigation before he can satisfy himself that all is right. A glance of pity, mingled with a slight smile, cast at his feet will renew and aggravate all his paralytic symptoms.

WHEN IT RAINS.

BY [illegible]

When it rains, and with the rain
 Never bird has heart to sing,
And across the window pane
 Is no sunlight glimmering;
When a pitiless refrain
 Brings a tremor to the lips,
Our tears are like the rain
 As it drips, drips, drips—
 Like the sad unceasing rain as it drips.

When the light of heaven's blue
 Is blurred and blotted quite,
And the dreary day to you
 Is but a long twilight;
When it seems that ne'er again
 Shall the sun break its eclipse,
Our tears are like the rain
 As it drips, drips, drips—
 Like the endless, friendless rain as it drips.

When it rains! weary heart,
 Oh, be of better cheer!
The leaden clouds will part
 And the morrow will be clear.
Take up your load again,
 With a prayer upon your lips,
Thanking heaven for the rain,
 As it drips, drips, drips—
 With the golden bow of promise as it drips.

THE FATED KING.

A Romance of Scottish History.

It was the night of the 20th of February, 1438. The King and Queen of Scotland held their court in the abbey of Black Friars at Perth.

The apartment was filled with the noble and fair, among whom James I. and his lovely consort were distinguished by their personal beauty and grace of manner, as well as by their rank.

In the recess of one of the lofty windows stood Robert Stuart, the grandson and heir of the Earl of Athol, a kinsman of the King, and his betrothed bride, the young and beautiful Lady Ida Randolph.

The young man had a fine figure and handsome features, but there was an expression about the eyes and mouth that indicated at times that his prepossessing exterior concealed a bad heart and a cruel disposition.

His eyes were fixed on the King with so fierce a gaze that the Lady Ida started as she beheld it.

"Robert," said she, "of what are you dreaming? You look at the King as fiercely as though you were Sir Robert Grahame himself."

"It was of him I was thinking, Ida," replied Stuart. "My unhappy kinsman, condemned to wander an outlaw among the mountain fastnesses, through the injustice and tyrannical severity of James."

"Not so, Robert," said Ida; "the King was not unjust."

"He refused to bestow upon him the Earldom of Strathern, to which he laid claim," answered he; "and he condemned him to prison for a crime that he might have committed with impunity in the reign of his father and during the regency of Albany. I marvel not; that on being freed from such ignoble bondage, a man of so fiery and haughty a spirit should seek to be revenged on his oppressor."

"He had no right to the Earldom of Strathern," said Ida, "and as for his imprisonment, the crime for which he suffered well deserved such punishment.

"I know that many of the nobles blame the King because he metes out the same justice to all classes; because he does not deem that noble blood should entitle its possessor to commit every dark and evil deed with impunity."

"But surely, you cannot excuse him for seeking the life of the King, for sending him a defiance, renouncing his allegiance to him, and threatening to destroy him with his own hand?"

"He has many good qualities," answered Stuart, evasively.

"Robert! Robert!" said Ida, her voice trembling with the earnestness with which she spoke, "speak not thus! Let me not hear you say aught in praise of a traitor and a murderer! The King has ever been a warm friend and an affectionate kinsman to you; why should you speak harshly of him, and kindly of his enemy?"

"Nay, nay, you mistake me, Ida," replied the young man. "I wished not to speak harshly of the King; I know that he has ever treated me with great kindness, and that he has honored me with the greatest confidence on every occasion; but Grahame was one of my dearest friends; I pity his fate, my friendship for him leads me to find excuses for his conduct, and I cannot help thinking that James has acted toward him with great severity."

"Yet speak not thus," said Ida; "it is most imprudent—should your words be repeated to the King—"

"I would probably have to share Grahame's disgrace and exile," interrupted he. "But fear not; I will not do aught to expose myself to danger, and as for what I have said this night, no one has heard me but you, and I think not that my Ida will betray me."

The Lady Ida looked up into his face with a smile, but before she could answer an attendant came to inform him that the King desired his presence.

He had never spoken either of the King or Grahame in the same manner before, and dark and undefined fears passed through her mind, but she quickly dismissed them, deeming herself unkind and unjust toward her affianced husband in harboring them for a moment.

It was late ere the company dispersed.

The King remained for some time after all had retired, conversing cheerfully with the Queen and her ladies.

Suddenly, however, a shade passed over his face, and he remained for some time in deep thought; at length, turning to the Queen, he said:

"Do you not remember that, when on my way here a few weeks since, I was met by an old Highland woman, who told me if I came to Perth I would never leave it alive? She was here this evening, and sought an interview with me, but she was informed that she could not be admitted to my presence at so late an hour. I regret that I did not see her. I know not why, but within the last few hours I have felt a strange presentiment of impending evil. There is an old prophecy that predicts that in this year a King will be killed in Scotland."

"And what, of whom do you fear, my lord?" asked the Queen.

"Robert Grahame has sworn to destroy me, as you know," replied James. "And I have cause to believe that there are many others in league with him to take my life, and there could not be a more favorable opportunity for him to make the attempt than the present."

The Queen shuddered.

She felt that there was every reason to fear that Grahame would endeavor to fulfill his oath ere long, for, owing to the small size of the abbey, the guards of the King were quartered among the citizens of Perth, and a few only of the personal attendants of the King and Queen were able to lodge in the monastery, so that James was much more exposed to danger while there than at any of the other royal residences.

Her eyes filled with tears.

"Nay, nay, my fair Queen, calm thyself," said James soothingly.

"I was wrong to say anything that could alarm you.

"There cannot be aught to fear—I bade my trusty kinsman, and gentleman of the bed-chamber, Robert Stuart, ere he retired for the night, to go over the abbey and look to bolt and bar.

"Should danger approach, the sentinels will give timely warning, and we will dispatch messengers to the city to summon our guard.

"So fear not, we can bid defiance to Robert Grahame and his troop of assassins."

As he spoke, strong light, apparently from the court-yard, flashed across the windows of the room.

The King sprang to the casement. The court-yard was filled with men, and by the light of the torches they carried he could see that they were armed, and among them he beheld his deadly foe.

"It is Grahame, he has come to perform his oath," said James calmly, turning from the window.

"Oh fly then, fly while there is yet time!" exclaimed the Queen, almost wild with terror.

"And whither shall I fly?" said the King. "It would be madness to attempt it, they must even now be in the abbey. Had I any place of concealment—but I know of none and I must even defend myself until aid arrives, or until my strength fails me."

"Not so, my lord," exclaimed the Lady Catharine Douglas, one of the ladies of honor of the Queen.

"I have heard there is a vault beneath this apartment that communicates with the court-yard, and I have been shown the plank in the floor which it is necessary to raise in order to descend into it. Once there, my lord, you can easily escape."

"You are right, fair lady," said the King. "I had forgotten the vault. I will descend into it; it may conceal me from my enemies, but unhappily I cannot escape from it, as the entrance into the court yard was walled up a few days ago by my order because when I played at ball, the ball frequently rolled down through the opening."

The plank was hastily raised, and the King descended. But before the plank was again lowered the voices and footsteps of the assassins were heard in the corridor, approaching the apartment.

The Lady Catharine Douglas flew to fasten the door, but the bar had been removed. Without a moment's hesitation she thrust her arm through the staples. But so frail an obstacle could not long keep out the intruders.

The door was soon burst open, but not until the arm of the heroic lady was broken.

The assassins rushed into the room. The plank had been lowered, and the terrified Queen and her ladies were standing together in a corner of the room. Grahame saw at a glance that his victim was not there, and was about ordering his followers to go with him to seek the King in the other apartments of the abbey, when one of the ruffians seized the Queen, and was about to plunge his dagger to her heart, when a son of Grahame interposed and saved her life.

At this moment the Lady Ida Randolph beheld among the conspirators her affianced husband, and, with a wild shriek, she pronounced his name.

"Knew ye not that your betrothed was in league with us? Had it not been for his care in removing bolt, bar and sentinel, we had not gained entrance here to-night."

Ida covered her face with her hands, and turned away.

"Let us be gone, Grahame, and seek the King," exclaimed Stuart, crimsoning with anger and shame.

"Know you not that, notwithstanding our precautions, some of the attendants have escaped? They will alarm the city, and the Royal Guard will be upon us ere long."

"You are right," said Grahame, "and I should be loth to leave the abbey without accomplishing that for which I came.

"Yet hear me, Lady Ida, you will think less harshly of the deeds of this night when you see the crown of Scotland on the brow of the heir of Athol, for it is my intention, and that of the nobles leagued with me, to place Robert Stuart on the throne of the tyrant whose reign will end to-night."

Ida uncovered her face, gazed after them wildly, and then, uttering a low cry, fell insensible on the floor.

After having sought their victim in vain through every part of the building, Robert Stuart, recollected the vault, and suggested that he might be concealed there.

They immediately returned to the apartment where the Queen and her ladies had passed the time of their absence in the most agonizing anxiety and suspense, and, tearing up the plank, beheld the unfortunate monarch standing below.

A demoniac yell burst from the conspirators at the sight, and two of the ruffians sprang down and threw themselves upon him.

James was unarmed, but, wrenching a dagger from one of his assailants, he dealt him a blow that laid him dead at his feet, and then, turning to the other assassin, he defended himself gallantly against him, when Grahame descended and stabbed him.

Weakened by loss of blood, unable to make any further resistance, the King sank on the floor of the vault, calling on his enemy to have mercy on him.

"Thou never hadst mercy on those of thine own blood, or any one else, therefore thou shalt find no mercy here," replied Grahame, plunging his sword into the body of his sovereign.

The vault was now filled with conspirators, and the unhappy Queen, throwing herself on the senseless form of her husband, sought to shield him from the blows with which his brutal enemies gratified their hatred by inflicting. It was not until she had been twice wounded, and now become insensible from terror, pain and distress, that she could be removed from the body.

The approach of the guard alarmed the conspirators, who sought safety in flight; but Grahame had fulfilled his oath; the King was dead.

The horrible deed excited the utmost indignation against its perpetrators among all classes in Scotland.

The King had been blamed by many, although without cause, for being unnecessarily strict and severe in the administration of justice, but his dreadful death caused all his faults to be forgotten.

So universal was the popular feeling against the conspirators, and so unceasing and energetic were the efforts made to capture them, that in less than a month every man connected with the conspiracy was a prisoner.

They were all put to death after undergoing the most horrible tortures.

Grahame protested, with his last breath, that he had only done his duty, in freeing his country from the yoke of a tyrant.

Robert Stuart died deeply penitent for his crime. When his dream of ambition had faded away, and he found that his treachery had conducted him to a murderer's cell instead of placing him on a King's throne, his conscience awoke, and he bitterly regretted the fearful deed that had brought upon him so terrible a punishment.

He wrote to Ida, telling her of his penitence and remorse, and beseeching her to forgive him.

Poor Lady Ida! the shock of finding that he she loved was capable of so fearful a crime added to her anxiety lest he should be captured; and her agony at his dreadful death was more than she could bear. She did not long survive him, but sank into an early grave a victim of his wild ambition and demoniac treachery.

Meat Versus Vegetable Diet.

The most plausible argument we have seen offered against the vegetarians for some time, is contained in a recent number of the Boston Journal of Chemistry. It relates experiments of Professor Hoffman, which tend to show that a far greater proportion of a meat diet is assimilated than of vegetable diet. It is said "we must consider not merely how much nutriment each puts into the body, but how much of it remains there and how much goes to waste." Prof. Hoffman fed a servant on vegetable diet and found that not one half of the albuminous matter had been digested. The same man was next fed on beef, fat and flour, and only one-fifth of the albuminous substance passed off as waste.

Experiments of other physiologists are quoted that gave similar results. The writer then concludes that "the results of these experiments by independent investigators evidently agree in proving that a much larger fraction of nutriment is utilized in the case of animal than in that of vegetable food. They go far toward knocking away the very foundations of vegetarianism by showing that our digestive apparatus is better adapted to deal with the former than the latter."

The experiments referred to by the Boston Journal of Chemistry are not logically conclusive. There is a flaw in the premises—or lots of room for one. The men experimented upon had in all probability been raised upon a miscellaneous diet, and their digestive powers are an unknown quantity, and so the experiments cannot prove much until they are repeated upon a healthy person who has been raised as a vegetarian. As people are now, doubtless meats are digested with less waste than vegetables, and possibly it remains true for everybody; but to determine just how much advantage of this kind is to be credited to meat diet it will be necessary to make a large number of careful experiments upon fair specimens of meat eaters and vegetarians, trying each on the different kinds of diet and comparing results. The animal kingdom furnishes abundant material for such investigation in different classes of carniverous and herbivorous domesticated animals, which field invites the attention of practical physiologists who desire to settle [illegible] question.—Dr. Foote's Health M[illegible]

A SMILE OF SATISFACTION.

This, from the Cleveland (Ohio) Penny Press, carries its own suggestion: Recently meeting Mr. H. G. Keffer, treasurer of the Cleveland Herald, our representative inquired of that gentleman, after stating his mission, if he personally knew anything about the Great German Remedy, St. Jacobs Oil. A smile played across Mr. Keffer's expressive face and his eyes twinkled merrily as he replied in the affirmative. I will not refuse to state my experience with it, and you may use it as you think best. Four years ago I sprained one of my ankles, an accident which, as you are aware, entails much suffering and sometimes leaves the limb in a condition to remind one frequently of the old hurt. Unfortunately this result ensued. Whenever the weather became damp or my system absorbed the slightest cold my ankles pained me. This went on at intervals for over three years, and I could not obtain relief. Last winter I applied the St. Jacobs Oil and it completely cured me. I have not since felt a return of the pain.

Our Army from 1789 to 1861.

The Trenton (N. J.) Gazette mentions the case of Mr. John Wood, with the American Pottery Co., that city, who was cured by St. Jacobs Oil of an attack of rheumatism, which had confined him to his bed for seventeen weeks. He praises it unstintedly.

A MEMOIR of much interest and importance upon the use of anæsthetics has been communicated to the Paris Academy of Science by Mons. Paul Bert. By experiment with different anæsthetic agents upon animals he has been able to ascertain in the case of each substance what is the quantity just sufficient to cause insensibility and how much suffices to produce death. He finds the fatal dose of chloroform, ether, amylene, bromide of ethyl and chloride of ethyl to be always exactly double the anæsthetic dose. The range between these extremes Mons. Bert terms the working zone, and he says that a mixture about the middle of this working zone, properly administered, will produce a safe state of insensibility, which may be maintained long enough for any surgical operation.

Public Politeness.

I was coming up town, and entered the stage in which five elegantly-dressed and fine-looking women were sitting on each side of it. They might be the lady patronesses of some society. There was room for another person on each side, but not one of those women moved to make room for me, and I rode a mile or more, while these ten women—I do not say ladies—declined to give me a seat, as they could have done any moment without rising or crowding. The most of them were probably mothers. But as the instinct of good manners—that is, of politeness, which is simply the law of kindness—was not in the breast of one of the ten, what is to be expected of their children? They cannot teach what they do not know, and, as they know nothing of politeness, their children will be boors.

Going to the omnibus again for a sample of manners, I opened the door to step in, the other day, when a boy took advantage of my holding it open, jumped in and took the only vacant seat, tickled that he got the start of me and got the seat. This was young America all over. The great Athenian philosopher said that democracy has the foundation in the principle that one man is as good as another, if not a little better. And many wise men have insisted that popular goverment tends to destroy reverence for superiors and deference to others, which are essential elements of refined manners. "In honor preferring one another," is the inspired religion of politeness.

It is not one of the highest virtues. It may be where there is no virtue. And I do not say the politest nations are the strongest, nor that it is impossible to get money, and power, and all that, with the manners of a pig. The very trait of character which the "gintleman who pays the rint" exhibits when he puts his foot into the trough to keep others away while he eats, is the trait of many who succeed in getting much money. But there is a better way. And it is the way that has few walking in it, in this day of ours.

Diet of the Japanese.

Of 36,000 cows slaughtered in Japan last year, more than one-half were consumed by foreigners on shore or ship. Few natives, except officers in the capital, sailors and soldiers, eat beef. Mutton and pork beyond the treaty ports are hardly yet known. About 200 varieties of fish are eaten, one-half of the people eating fish every day. The food of the masses is "90 per cent. vegetable." The list of food plants in use, not including sea plants, was prepared for the pamphlet, with their analyses, by Prof. Edward Kinch, of the Tokio University. A large number of these substances are unknown, or at least unused, in the United States. Of rice, which occupies in its culture one-half of the cultivated land, there are 250 varieties of seed in the country. Millet is extensively used, but bread raised from a "sponge" of yeast is hardly yet known in the popular diet, the old Latin-Portuguese word pan being, however, in use. The soybean, which in chemical composition closely approaches animal fiber, is extensively cultivated. Probably no country excels Japan in the variety of leguminous plants raised for food. Of tubers and roots, the sweet potato is the most popular, though, strange to say, as much tabooed by the aristocratic classes as onions are supposed to be among us. Sixteen million bushels of these "Satsuma potatoes" were produced last year, while the "Java" or "Dutch"—our common white potato—is left to foreigners, the native palate not liking it. Lily bulbs—sixteen varieties—serve as food, boiled and served with "drawn butter." The lotus root is eagerly eaten without oblivion of country or decay of patriotism. Poppy seeds powdered as condiment, infusions of salted cherry blossoms for drink, horse-chestnuts and acorns are among the articles of diet.

Letting a Dog Loose.

A saloon-keeper on Gratiot avenue paid certain parties in Chicago $25 for a stuffed lion to add to the attractions of his saloon, and as the place was being scrubbed out the lion was placed at the front door to keep him out of the wet. Half a block down the street a farmer was having his wagon repaired, and a big bulldog was chained to the axletree. He grew uneasy the minute the lion was rolled out, and it needed only a few encouraging words from the boys to render him half frantic. He growled and plunged and tore around and attracted quite a crowd, among which was a man who remarked:

"That's a purty brave dog of yours, stranger."

"Brave! I'd like to see the man or beast he wouldn't tackle!" replied the owner.

"I dunno about that. Never saw a dog yet who would stand before a lion."

"Well here's one who'd stand before two lions. See how anxious he is to get there?"

"Yes, but he puts that on because he's chained. If he was loose you couldn't get him within a rod of that specimen."

"Couldn't eh? Maybe you want to hear yourself talk."

"Well, I dunno. I'm opposed to betting, card-playing, dancing and all that, but seeing you are rather sassy about this, I've got half a dollar here which says that you can't get that dog to go within six feet of that lion."

"Put up the money—put up the money!" shouted the farmer as he went down into his own pockets for the coin.

The money was put up, the crowd fell back and the farmer's face wore a smile of triumph as he still further excited the dog and then slipped his collar. With a yell of rage the "canine" made a bee-line for the king of beasts, and in another moment there was reason for a terrific yell of applause. Dog and lion filled the air, so to say. The lion was rolled over and over, grabbed by the throat and shaken around, drawn across the street and back by the ear, and when the dog finally let up on the corpse the battle-ground was covered with hair and hay and saw-dust and glass-eyes. At that moment the saloon-keeper rushed out, a policeman came up, and for five minutes the air was rent with shouts and exclamations and expostulations.

"It was all in fun," explained the farmer.

"Who put up this job?" demanded the officer as he glared around on the crowd.

By and by a deep silence fell upon the crowd, and in a voice which had only kindness in it the owner of the lion said he must have his $25 or he would start for the Police Court. The policeman said it was certainly a case for the courts, and the crowd said the farmer might have known what would happen. He protested but finally came to time, and when he had passed over a $10 bill and given his note for the balance, he had only one sentence to utter. That was:

"Now, then, I'll give any of you five acres of land to put me face to face with the outlaw who put up this job on a hard-working, innocent man!"—Detroit Free Press.

The Pewter Age in New England.

In the early New England days wooden ware was in far more common use than would be supposed, and a handsome set of pewter was an enviable possession. As for china, any amount of that betokened unusual prosperity. There was very little money in the farming districts of New England for many years and numerous persons live in vastly more comfortable fashion now on the same land which gave their ancestors a bare living fifty years ago. We can have no idea what a serious thing it was in the last century, or early in this present one, to undertake any new expense; for instance, sending a boy to college. To raise an extra two or three hundred a year meant that the men and women both should drudge early and late and deny themselves most cruelly. Any one who looks closely at the signs that are left us of the pewter-plate age in Massachusetts will find much that is interesting, and he may discover in the fields the nameless graves of many a hero and heroine, unmarked except by a rough lichened stone gathered from the abundant harvest of the soil. The building of so many mills and the rapid growth of the manufacturing villages have afforded better markets; and beside the money that the young people have earned and brought home, the income of the farms has been made larger year by year, and the farm houses and the way of living in them have steadily grown more comfortable. The pewter was not all melted into bullets wherewith to fight our foes, but it is fast disappearing in other ways; the great platters were one by one gathered to their rest by the tin peddlers when pewter was high in the war-time and the little plates have been melted on the stoves by careless cooks.—Atlantic Monthly.

NEW YORK Commercial Advertiser: "Charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up," and yet some men expect a puff every time they give a dollar to an indignant old woman's society.

"WHAT is the greatest charge on record?" asked the professor of history. And the absent-minded student answered: "Seventeen dollars for hack hire for self and girl for two hours."

A YOUNG Oil City lady recently visited New York, and when she returned related how she stopped at a "palatable hotel and went up and down stairs in a cultivator." Her parents should cultivate her.—Oil City Derrick.

BARON MUELLER, a botanist, says that in Australia there are trees 480 feet high. It would be interesting to have some information as to the height of the Baron's imagination and the depth of the whisky in the average Australian bar-tumbler.

WE don't know much about the opinion of the bearded lady, but we do know lots of girls—real nice ones, too—who are highly delighted with a full-blown mustache on their upper lip. Try this on your girl, young man; you'll surely find hirsuted.

"WHAT do you think of my article on the political situation?" inquired Fenderson. "Everybody I have heard speak of it," replied Fogg, "praises it very highly." "Do they?" said Fenderson, eagerly. "Whom have you heard speak of it?" Nobody but yourself," said Fogg, carelessly.

THE French are still "running" the mother-in-law jokes. Le Figaro says: "A traveler, turning to his neighbor, said: 'I think, sir, it would be prudent to shut the window on your side; it admits a current of air really dangerous to your mother-in-law.' To which the other, with a cruel smile, said: 'I know it.'"

WHILE an Idaho girl was sitting under a tree waiting her lover, a grizzly bear came along, and, approaching from behind, began to hug her. But she thought it was Tom, and so leaned back and enjoyed it heartily, and murmured "tighter." It broke the bear all up, and he went away and hid in the forest for three days to get over his shame.

As a Woodward avenue car was on its way down town it was halted by the vigorous shouts and gestures of a man nearly a block away. He finally reached the car, puffing and blowing, dropped into a seat for a minute, and then began feeling for his nickel to pay fare with. He went through every pocket twice over, he stood up and shook himself, and then bolted out of the car and dropped off into the mud, saying to a man on the platform: "If you hear of the sudden death of a fool you may know that it's me."—Detroit Free Press.

FRIENDS.

"We will be friends," she said, and smiled
  With that soft grace that pity lends;
A little of my pain beguiled,
  I kissed her hand, "We will be friends."
No law forbids a friend to love—
  My sweet forgot how pity ends—
Now when my patience she doth prove,
  "Fair wife," I whisper, "come, be friends."

The Great Wall of China.

The great wall of China was built by Che Hwang-te, who has been named "the Universal Emperor." This ruler made many improvements, building roads, forming canals, and erecting numerous and handsome public buildings throughout his domains, as well as subduing his enemies, who were threatening him, and putting down several formidable rebellions. When he had strengthened himself and his empire, he discovered that the Northern States of Thsin, Chaou, and Yen were building lines of fortification along their northern frontier for protection against the incursions of the Heung-noo, and then he conceived the idea of building one great wall, which was to stretch across the entire northern limits of the vast empire from the sea to the farthest western corner of the modern province of Kan-suh. The year 214 before Christ witnessed the beginning of this work, which was under the immediate supervision of the Emperor. It was pushed forward very vigorously, but he died before its completion. It is pronounced by some as the most gigantic work of defense ever erected by man. In some places it is a simple rampart, in others a solid foundation of granite, while the eastern section has a height of from fifteen to twenty feet, and a breadth such that six horsemen may ride abreast upon it. At various distances there are towers of brick about forty feet in height. It is stated that, with its windings, it is from 1,200 to 1,500 miles in length.

Where We Get the Word "Bosh."

Says an English paper: Bois-le-Duc, or, as the Dutch called it, "Hertogenbosch," or "Bosch," a town of Dutch Brabant, has had the distinction of adding a new word to the English language, the word "bosh" signifying rubbish. Hertogenbosch is celebrated as manufacturing the very worst butter in all Europe, which at the present time is largely imported by the London buttermen, and the term "Bosh butter" came by degrees to be applied to all artificial butter, and even to rubbish of various other kinds.

The Cause of Mob Law.

The existence of mob law in a community indicates either a state of semi-civilization as displayed in our frontier settlements where government is still in embryo, or a lack of confidence in the justice meted out by the courts. When we find this disorder apparently increasing in old and conservative portions of the country, and when summary vengeance for crime is winked at if not openly approved by sober, respectable people, it is evident that something more than ordinary is wrong. They don't approve of mob law because they believe it to be right. They know it is all wrong, and a disgrace to the community even when the sufferer from it deserved his fate, instead of being, as is sometimes the case, an entirely innocent individual. Why is this? There can be only one answer. It is the delay and difficulty, if not impossibility in many cases, of punishing criminals through the ordinary methods. The Constitution was careful to guarantee to criminals the right to a speedy and impartial trial, but that in most cases is the last thing they want. The very first effort of a prisoner's attorneys, too often successful, is for delay, in the hope that new subjects may engross the attention of the public, witnesses become scattered and the most unfavorable facts forgotten. That the public has any right to a speedy trial is a fact too often ignored. This of itself tends to encourage crime, for the moral effect of punishment is largely lost when so long delayed, even if conviction is attained. Then the insanity dodge has been played so extensively of late years as to practically work a denial of justice. Men whose sanity had been trusted all through life in every sort of business transactions are suddenly found to have become irresponsible beings, and the law which would have held a man responsible in all ordinary matters suddenly finds him irresponsible should he take a notion to imbrue his hands in the blood of his fellow-man. To heighten the absurdity, if possible, a person whom twelve men have declared so insane that he can kill his brother without legal responsibility, is allowed to go forth a free man to carry out his deadly work on some one else. It would seem that even lunatics who go about killing people ought to be confined in the interests of society. The general public is entirely out of patience with all this, and the feeling has become very general that if the courts will not punish criminals the people will take the law in their own hands. This is not creditable, but dealing with facts, there is no use mincing things. When the people of this country conclude to abolish capital punishment they will do it through their Legislatures, and in the meantime they expect the courts to punish crime speedily and vigorously. With the certainty that punishment in a legal way is sure to follow crime the motive and excuse for mob action will disappear, and with it the acts themselves.—Steubenville Herald.

A Cheap Cologne Water.

The only perfume which never seems to offend any and which leaves no unpleasant tang behind it is that of cologne water, which stimulates while it soothes the senses, and suggests a pleasant wholesomeness, instead of any sickish sweetness, as the best of extracts and essences and bouquets are apt to do. We do not mean, of course, the cheap and common cologne water of the druggists, which is usually very much worse than none at all; and wont to leave, after drying, the smell of burned sugar where it has been used often, as it is made of the poorest spirit, and necessarily without subsequent distillation; without regard to the fact that it requires the strongest proof or rectified spirit to dissolve the combined oils properly where the process of distillation is not used. Indeed, with no trouble at all, any one can make in her own store room a better article of cologne than that which is usually bought, by thoroughly dissolving a fluid dram of the oil of bergamot, orange and rosemary each, with half a dram of neroli and a pint of rectified spirit. As good as can be made out of cologne itself, however, is also quite as comfortably prepared at home as at the chemist's—at so much less than the chemist's prices that one feels warranted in using it freely—simply by mixing with one quart of rectified spirit, two fluid drams each of the oils of bergamont and lemon, one of the oils of orange and half as much of that of rosemary, together with three-quarters of a dram of neroli and four drops each of the essences of ambergris and musk. If this is subsequently distilled it makes what may be called a perfect cologne, but it becomes exceedingly fine by being kept tightly stoppered for two or three months to ripen and mellow before use.—Harper's Bazaar.

The Purpose of Reading.

Every reader should know the purpose for which he reads. Usually this purpose is either rest, amusement, or what may be called improvement. A boy or girl, tired by work in the shop or house, takes up Hawthorne's "Wonder Book,"—that is reading for rest. Fretted by low marks at school, one becomes absorbed in "Swiss Family Robinson"—that is reading for amusement. Eager to instruct the mind, you read Bancroft's "History of the United States"—that is reading for improvement.

The three purposes are frequently combined. One may find in reading Macaulay's "Essay on Bacon," rest, amusement, and improvement.

Of these purposes that of improvement of mind and heart is most important. In all reading whose immediate aim is either recreation or pleasure, the remote aim should be the formation of a noble character. No one should read a book without resolving to be aided by it in every right endeavor.

The purpose for which one reads determines the choice of the book. If you are in doubt what to read, form a clear idea of the reason of your reading, and the selection of a proper book is made easy.—Morgantown Press.

Mrs. Barbauld's Childhood.

One can fancy the little assiduous girl, industrious, impulsive, interested in everything—in all life and all nature—drinking in, on every side, learning, eagerly wondering, listening to all around with bright and ready wit. There is a pretty little story told by Mrs. Ellis in her book about Mrs. Barbauld, how one day, when Dr. Aiken and a friend "were conversing on the passions," the doctor observes that joy cannot have place in a state of perfect felicity, since it supposes an accession of happiness. "I think you are mistaken, papa," says a little voice from the opposite side of the table. "Why so, my child?" says the doctor. "Because in the chapter I read to you this morning, in the Testament, it is said that 'there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance.'" Besides her English Testament and her early reading, the little girl was taught by her mother to do as little daughters did in those days—to obey a somewhat austere rule, to drop curtsies in the right place, to make beds, to preserve fruits. The father, after demur, but surely not without some paternal pride in her proficiency, taught the child Latin and French and Italian, and something of Greek, and gave her an acquaintance with English literature. One can imagine little Nancy, with her fair head bending over her lessons, or, when playing-time had come, perhaps a little lonely and listening to the distant voices of the schoolboys at their games. The mother, fearing she might acquire rough and boisterous manners, strictly forbade any communication with the schoolboys. Sometimes in after days, speaking of these early times and of the constraint of many by-gone rules and regulations, Mrs. Barbauld used to attribute to this early, formal training something of the hesitation and shyness which troubled her and never entirely wore off. She does not seem to have been in any great harmony with her mother. One could imagine a fanciful and high-spirited child, timid and dutiful, and yet strong-willed, secretly rebelling against the rigid order of her home, and feeling lonely for want of liberty and companionship. It was true she had birds and beasts and plants for her playfellows, but she was of a gregarious and sociable nature, and perhaps she was unconsciously longing for something more, and feeling a want in her early life which no silent company can supply.—The Cornhill Magazine.

Cropping the Hair.

At length it appears, says an exchange, that a radical change in the fashion of arranging woman's greatest glory, her hair, is really to take place. We hear rumors of impending innovation from headquarters—in other words, from Paris. It is probable, though, that they will here be simply voices in the air and nothing more for some time still. First, because a new fashion never gets fairly started with us until it is almost an old one on the other side (this statement may sound both unfair and unpleasant, but it is literally exact, nevertheless), and then become the close, prim, demure little coiffure a l'Anglaise which is now worn, and has been for the past two years or more, is exceptionally suited to the small, delicate head and slim face of the average American woman. It is not so well suited to the piquant, irregular-featured "minors" of the Parisiennes, however. Therefore they have begun to adopt a looser, softer, less severe style of coiffure.

The hair will, during the winter, it seems, be worn lower on the neck in coils, braids, or curls, and in the evening, when flowers are added, they will be mounted in trailing sprays and garlands, to fall gracely on the said coils, braids, or curls. The latter (the curls) are apparently destined again to most especial favor. And there have been recently a number of young ladies seen abroad with their hair cropped short like a boy's, and curled in fluffy rings all over the head, after that same fashion so very much in vogue about ten years ago.

There are faces to which it is an undeniably becoming coiffure, this. But as to its being generally becoming, or even remotely so—that is not, assuredly. A blonde, rather small and delicate and vivacious, with eyes soft, silky hair, and rather a child-like face, perhaps, looks most charming with her sunny halo of clustering rings, quite a cherub, and probably ten years younger than she is.

We knew a Polish lady some few years ago, with a pretty, pale, spirituelle face, ash-blonde hair, dark-brown eyes, and a mole on her left cheek, who had adopted this coiffure, with a black velvet and blue ribbon passed across the front occasionally, and it suited her to absolute perfection. But then there are hosts of women who, after they have made the sacrifice of hair for a passing of fashion, look anything but well with cropped and curly heads—in fact, look quite decidedly the opposite from well. And it is no small sacrifice for a woman with a fine suit of hair to have it cut off, either. The result should pay very well to make the performance at all satisfactory. It is one of those cases in which the immortal Shakespeare's counsel to look before we leap may be pondered with good effect.

IT IS said that those who wish to do any painting on or about their mills, will find the following an excellent and cheap recipe, which will last much longer than any ordinary whitewash: Three hundred parts washed and sieved white sand, forty parts of precipitated chalk, fifty parts of resin and four parts of linseed oil are mixed and boiled in an iron kettle, and then one part of oxide of copper and one part of sulphuric acid are added. This mass is applied with an ordinary paint brush while warm. If it is too thick it is diluted with linseed oil. This paint dries very rapidly and gets very hard, but protects the wood excellently.

A RURAL subscriber wants to know if it makes any difference in the lastingness of fence-posts whether you set them "top end up," or the same way the tree grew, or "top end down." Not a bit. A fence-post will last just as long set "top end up" or "top end down." In setting a hen, however, there is a vital importance in this distinction, which the careful poulterer will do wisely to observe.—Hawk-Eye.

The Mound of Mourning.

According to a Welsh legend there is a mound which is called the Mound of Mourning; and on the mound there is a cairn or heap of rocks, and in the cairn there is a serpent, and on the tail of the serpent there is a stone, and the virtue of the stone is such that whosoever holds it in one hand can have in the other as much gold as he wishes; but first he must fight with the serpent. To touch the magic stone many unfortunates have met their doom even while the yellow gold filled their itching palm. Some died, some lost an eye, some, terrified by the monster, became insane or returned to their homes, only to die because their sleep was disturbed by evil dreams.

A Dare-Devil of the Georgia Mountains.

There are few men in Georgia, probably, who have given the officers more trouble than Jack Pugh, and we doubt if any one has been more successful in eluding them. Catch him and surround him as they would, he always managed to slide out from under their thumbs. Long, lank, lean, and wiry, and possessed of unusual activity for one of his build, he has kept up his dare-devil career with the fearlessness of a border ruffian. Pugh will fight a circular saw, and has never been afraid to meet the best armed officers, always being ready and on the alert. His wife, too, is a tough customer when on her muscle. Some time ago one Rawls said something to her about Jack at the house, when she took up a board and with true Amazonian courage cleaned him completely up, making him bite the dust in a jiffy. Pugh says he hasn't slept inside of a house in three years. If all his exploits in evading the law and swindling the government were dished up in dime-novel style, it would make the hair of the average boy stand wildly on end. Being an illicit distiller of the ardent is not his only reputation. He is said to be a clever counterfeiter.—Griffin (Ga.) News.

KIDNEY-WORT

TRUTH IS MIGHTY. [illegible]

Dr HARTER'S IRON TONIC

[illegible]

WHEN WRITING TO ADVERTISERS please say you saw the advertisement in this paper.

KIDNEY-WORT

DOES WONDERFUL CURES! WHY?

Because it cleanses the system of the poisonous humors that develope in Kidney and Urinary Diseases, Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation, Piles, or in Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Nervous Disorders and Female Complaints.

SEE WHAT PEOPLE SAY:

Eugene B. Stork, of Junction City, Kansas, says, Kidney-Wort cured him after regular Physicians had been trying for four years.

Mrs. John Arnall, of Washington, Ohio, says her boy was given up to die by four prominent physicians and that he was afterwards cured by Kidney-Wort.

M. M. B. Goodwin, an editor in Chardon, Ohio, says he was not expected to live, being bloated beyond belief, but Kidney-Wort cured him.

Anna L. Jarrett of South Salem, N. Y., says that seven years suffering from kidney troubles and other complications was ended by the use of Kidney-Wort.

John B. Lawrence of Jackson, Tenn., suffered for years from liver and kidney troubles and after taking "barrels of other medicines," Kidney-Wort made him well.

Michael Coto of Montgomery Center, Vt., suffered eight years with kidney difficulty and was unable to work. Kidney-Wort made him "well as ever."

KIDNEY-WORT

PERMANENTLY CURES
KIDNEY DISEASES, LIVER COMPLAINTS,
Constipation and Piles.

A Nice Bible.

We were shown a new edition of the bible, the other day, that is unquestionably the best ever sold in this part of the country. The type is large and clear, and the illustrations are of the best, great pains having been taken to make them natural and correct. The costumes of the High Priests, the tabernacle with its furniture and covering are all drawn, so as to show not only the shape and make of these articles, but the color as well as the gold and the bronze vessels. There are 2000 fine illustrations, and the book contains 2,000 pages. It has the celebrated Cruden's Concordance complete, a bible dictionary, the Apocrypha, the life of Christ, a history of the bible and of each of its books, the Psalm and an appendix in which is the new translation of the New Testament, so that readers can compare it with the common edition. It has an account of the recent explorations of the Bible Lands with maps and pictures of the leading cities. A new and valuable feature is the showing in the natural colors, of the plants, etc. This splendid work is being sold by J. F. Morr, who will canvass the entire county. Every student of the bible or of bible history, and every Sunday school worker should have a copy of this great family work. 62t

Why He Objected.

A crude old farmer, living on the line of one of the recent railroad surveys, and who is owner of a barn of large dimensions, with huge swinging doors on both sides, observed a posse of surveyors busily engaged in driving a row of stakes through his premises that extended to the very center of his big barn. Sauntering leisurly toward the trespassers, with an air savoring somewhat of indignation, he addressed the leader of the gang as follows:

"Layin' out another railroad?"

"Surveying for one," was the reply.

"Goin' through my barn?"

"Don't see how we can avoid it."

"Well, now, mister," said the worthy farmer, "I calkerlate I've got sumthin' tew say 'bout that. I want you tew understan' that I've got sumthin' else tew dew besides runnin' out tew open and shet them doors every time a train wants tew go through."

—"This is very like a whale," as the school boy said when he received a merited castigation from the teacher.

"It's easy enough, after you get your hand in," was the reply of the criminal with the fetters on his wrist.—Meriden Recorder.

—If you expect to find purity in politics you are as unreasonable as the circus owner who sent his elephat up to the depot to get his trunk checked.

—"Let me see," said some one to Talfourd, on a cold winter day, "I believe you never wear a great coat?" "No," was the quick reply, "I never was."

—A sure cure for consumption, bronchial affections, sore lungs, whooping cough and all complaints of the throat, lungs or chest. We mean Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup.

—A New York man has discovered an "invisible soap." It is the same article that small boys have used in their morning ablutions from the most remote periods.—New Haven Register.

IMPORTANT TO TRAVELERS.—Special inducements are offered by the Burlington route. It will pay you to read their advertisement to be found elsewhere in this issue. 19 1y.

—Workingmen! look to your interests and save doctor bills, by using Dr Marshall's Lung Syrup for all cases of coughs, colds, etc. Price only twenty-five and fifty cents a bottle.

—Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the laws that govern the female system. Address Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, 233 Western Avenue, Lynn, Mass., for circular. 5-2w.

IT SEEMS IMPOSSIBLE that a remedy made of such common, simple plants as Hops, Buchu, Mandrake, Dandelion, etc., should make so many and such great cures as Hop Bitters do; but when old and young, rich and poor, pastor and doctor, lawyer and editor, all testify to having been cured by them, you must believe and try them yourself, and doubt no longer. 5-2w.

SOME of our exchanges are engaged in the very harmless pastime of making up slates for the next county election.

AN ex-governor of Maine wanted an office, and as there seemed to be no vacancy, a new office was created for him. He was made a pension agent at Augusta, where no agency had existed up to that date.

JAMES, the ex-postmaster general, while claiming that he saved about a million on the star routes, allowed one and a half millions extra to the Vanderbilt lines for extra service. So his own party friends say.

Holloway' Pills

Never despair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispels doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

—Downy way of putting it: Men are geese, women are ducks and birds of a feather flock together.

—The man who picked up a "well filled pocketbook," the other day, was disgusted to find it full of tracts on honesty.

—The Burlington Hawkeye admires a man who loses a nickle under a plank sidewalk, and feeling for it picks up a raw bumble bee by the rudder.

—He who despises praise will be happy. He who buys Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup can cure a cough, cold are bronchial affections. Druggists and agents.

—In the assurance of strength. Lung complaints are cured by Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup in a short time and strength returns. Twenty-five and fifty centsabottle.

—The ladies who sometimes since were unable to go out, having taken Lydie E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, are quite recovered, and have gone on their way rejoicing. 7-2w

—When a Coston girl is presented with a boquet, she says, "Oh, how deliciously sweet; its fragrance impregnates the entire atmosphere of the room! A down east girl simply says, "It smells scrumptious; thanks, Reuben."

—The female plaintiff in a westenr divorce suit was asked, upon taking the stand and prior to be sworn, if she believed in a future life: "I used to," she answered; "but since I was married I've had all the nonsense taken out me."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"What luck did you have fishing, Breckenridge?" asked a Galveston gentleman of a well known impecunious character who owes everybody. "Splendid! While I was out on the wharf 20 men with bills called at my house to collect money."—News.

—A Cincinnati youth practiced smoking cigars and blowing the smoke from his nose, but just as everybody thought him smart he became deaf, and is likely to remain so.—Detroit Free Press. He must have had a very poor nose for hearing.—Ex.

"Ploughed Under" is the title of a book which it is claimed was written by Bright Eyes, the Indian girl. But people who are posted on the Indian question know that the daughters of the forest are too busy picking bugs out of their hair to write books.

—There is only one woman we know of in this city, who can let other women pass by without looking after them to see whether their polonaises are shirred in the elbow and cut bias to the watch-pocket. The woman in question is a sign at one of our stores.—Ex.

—When a man fails to laugh at one of the King of Burmah's jokes, he is knocked down and traveled over and strewed about. And its a great blessing that the King's jokes are always so funny that nobody ever seems able to help laughing at them.

—A soft voice in woman alwas goes with a gentle spirit. A gentleman sitting in a friend's parlor, engaged in conversation with him, was startled by a noise down stairs, and paused to ask: "What's that—a crash of crockery?" "No; that's only my wife calling to me."

—Mr. Joe. Beasley, an experimental gardner near Columbus, Ga., has succeeded in raising some melons with a delicious lemon flavor. He made an incision in the vine a short distance from the root, to which he attaches a lemon, and, by means of absorption, the juice is taken into the melons.

—"Necessity is the mother of invention." The high price of eggs this winter drove a cute Yankee to invent a nest in the bottom of which is a trap-door, through which the egg, when laid immediately drops, and the hen, looking around and perceiving none, immediately goes to work and lays another.

GENTLEMAN—Your Hop Bitters have been of great value to me. I was laid up with typhoid fever for over two months and could get no relief until I tried Hop Bitters. To those suffering from debility or any one in feeble health, I cordially recommend them. J. C. Stoetzel, 683 Fulton St., Chicago, Ill. 7-2w

For the Ladies.

—A lady who has made many infant's bands and thinks them the best she ever used, says she makes them of Saxony yarn, and knits two, and seams two, held loosely not to be stretched on the needles. Knit round like a stocking, twelve inches round and six inches long, a square piece is knitted on the front to pin to the diaper, and is one inch and a half wide and one inch long. If washed often, wash in cool water, with a little borax or ammonia, instead of soap, and wring so as to stretch up and down.

—A pretty tidy is made of alternate strips of velvet and aida canvass. These strips are all the same length, straight at the top but pointed at the bottom. Sew them together and embroider the edges of the velvet ones in feather or some other fancy stitch with bright hued silks. This is all the ornamentation necessary to produce a good effect but if greater elaboration is desired, work some pretty pattern in cross stitch on the canvas strips finish by blind-stitching all around and fastening a tassel on each point. The tassels can be made of Zephyr to correspond with colors used. After they are finished take a needle and separate the zephyr as much as possible without breaking. This gives a soft fleecy look.

VALUABLE RECEIPTS:

CROUP.—In croup or lung trouble, where there is difficulty in breathing, slack lime and let the patient inhale the steam.

SUGAR COOKIES.—Two cups sugar, small cup butter, three eggs and teaspoonful soda.

—CORN STARCH CAKE—One cup sugar, half cup butter; beat these to a cream then add the yolks of two eggs, one cup flour, one and a half teaspoonfuls baking powder, half cup milk, half cup cornstarch; lastly add the whites of two eggs flavored with lemon or vanilla.

—BUTTER SCOTCH.—One pound brown sugar, three ounces butter, put in a stew pan and stir often to prevent burning. Try a little in water; if brittle it is done. Pour out on buttered tins and mark in squares. A little grated lemon rind improves the flavor.

SCALLOPED POTATOES.— Pare and slice your potatoes. Cover the bottom of a baking dish with bread crumbs, then add a layer of the potatoes, then butter, salt and peper, so continue until the dish is filled. Wet the whole with milk, and bake for an hour and a half.

—Peter Henderson recommends the following mixture as a remedy for milden on rose bushed. Boil one pound of sulpher and also one pound of lime in two gallons of water until it is reduced to three quarts. After settling pour it into a bottle or jar to keep. Before using it add one hundred and fifty times as much water to each portion of the bottle so that it will not be so strong as to injure the leaves.

—A successful Boston florist gives the following as a method of starting slips of rare and tender plants. Underneath the usual layer of sand which the slips are planted, and covering the bottom of the pot or box, he places a layer of vats, which, when soaked with moisture, exude a mucilagenous substance, acting as a stimulant and feeder to the tender roots of the slip. By this method he seldom fails to root the slips.

—Indiana has 2,252 women engaged in the honorable occupation of farming against fifty-two who are put down among the statistics as barkeepers. The same state reports sixty-six authoresses, and 532 women who are keeping boarding houses. One hundred and seven Indiana females sell books, and the other vacations accessible to women are well represented. We notice that Indiana females, when thrown upon their own resources, have a habit of taking good care of themselves.—Cin. Enquirer.

In Newlin's Township, North Carolina, about ten days ago, Joe Woody contracted with a colored man, Ephraim Alston, to have some rails split. Near a school house Woody had allowed the pupils to cut a tree and use the top for firewood. Ephram went to work upon the butt cut of this tree, splitting it into rails. When it had been quartered, the next thing was to heart each section, as practical rail splitters understand. In doing the latter act he struck a regular bonanza, and twenty-six pieces of glittering gold coin fell out, worth $10 or more each. These coins were concealed in an inch and a quarter auger hole, over which the tree had grown in thickness about four inches. On the outside no traces of the hole could be seen. From the growth of the tree since the boaring of the hole it is supposed that the coins were put there not later than 1812. In diameter the tree was about two feet, and it is not likely that the concealing dates as far back as Revolutionary times.—Alamance Gleaner.

FAIRFIELD CENTER.

Wheat is badly killed in some parts of this township, partly by the insects that worked in it during the fall, and unfavorable weather at that time and since.

Trustee Reinoehl is looking over his school and taking great interest in this work.

Our enterprising teachers have had another extra institute. This one was at No. 9, and and was held last Saturday. We learn that the attendance was good and good work was done. Supt. Barns was present and assisted. This makes two extra institutes held by our teachers, and speaks volumes in their favor as workers. Several teachers were present from other townships.

C. P. Houser, of Auburn attended the institute at No. 9.

The literary last Friday evening was well attended. A lesson on the globe was given by Mr. Barns, showing the cause of the changes of seasons, the diferent lengths of the day and night, the changes of the moon and other prolems of interest to the audience. After the president Mr. Ash. and secretary E. Buchanan, called up the regular programme. This consisted of declamations and a debate. The performances were very creditable. The laughable part was the programme for the next meeting. This was made up of only thirty-five exercises followed by recess, after which came the solitary debate.

Dr. Rudolf is kept pretty busy vaccinating the people, and attending to his other professional duties.

Misses Libbie and May Bevier, of Waterloo, and Will Parnell, of Hudson, attended the literary here last week.

Leander and Albert Buchanan and their families were at the institute Saturday, as was also Mr. Ernest and a number of others whose names we did not lean. This shows a healthy interest in the school work.

The Ligonier Banner has the following pointed remarks which we commend to such of our readers as may happen to be of the same oppinon as "Alexis:"

"Alexis," our versatile Rome City correspondent, undertook to show last week that there was no real difference at present between the two great political parties. He is evidently laboring under the very common mistake supposing that, because there is no so called "burning issue" to excite the popular mind, the aims and purposes of the two parties are substantially alike. In taking this superficial view of the situation, he entirely ignores the existence of fundamental principles. These will always be the real issue between the two great parties. He forgets that while the true Democrats desire a pure, simple, inexpensive government, administrated by a few well-chosen trusty servents, the Republicans want the extravagance and gorgeousness of royalty. Democrats will local self government; the Rebublicans want centralization and imperialism, Democrats want a tariff to raise a revenue, while Republicans want protection for a favored few, and would extort a tax from consumers for the benefit of the manufacturer. These are a few of the direct issues betweeu the democratic and republican parties.

RHEUMATIC DISEASES.

These ailments follow from torpid liver and costive bowels; the skin, bowels and kidneys failing in their proper work, an acrid poison is formed in the blood, which is the occasion of these acute diseases. Kidney-Wort produces healthy action of all secretive organs, and throws off the rheumatic poison. Equally efficient in Liquid or Dry form,—Inter Ocean.

AT THE MESS TABLE.

BY GEORGE E. BASTRAM.

At the mess table brooded silence,
  And the fire flickered low,
And the guests seemed thinking sadly
  Of home and long ago;
And the General bade the Captain,
  Bearded and bronzed and hale,
"Come, give us one of your stories,"
  And the Captain told this tale:

"THE PHANTOM OF THE PECOS.

"It was a sultry summer, some twenty years ago,
When the emigrant train left Texas, bound for New Mexico.
Strong men and gentle women—threescore were in the band,
And nigh as many children left was foot-prints in the sand.

The sun, a ball of fire, in the brazen heaven glowed;
The sands were like red plowshares beneath a martyr's feet;
And the thorny spikes of cactus drooped, shriveled in the heat.

"There was no wind till evening, and then its fevered breath
Like that was of the angel that bears the brand of death;
And the moon, a fiery crescent, swooned in the sky afar,
As it had been the reddened blade of his baleful cimetar.

"And as they traveled northward, within its sandy bed,
The river shrank away from them as if with guilty dread,
And narrower grew the water, and shallower, until
The river had dwindled to a creek, the creek to a muddy rill.

"Then here and there a languid pool in those accursed lands,
And then the river-bed was naught but rocks and arid sands,
And the little water that they found by digging long and deep
Was bitter as that on sea-side rocks when the tide is at the neap.

"And as into the thirsty earth the treacherous river sank,
Fewer the following foot-prints upon its burning bank;
Twenty beheld the red sun rise, fifteen flagged faint at noon,
And only ten went into camp under the lurid moon.

"And twice again the red moon sank, twice rose the copper sun,
And the ten that staggered on were eight, were five, were three, were one.
One man was left of the emigrant train that two short weeks ago
Had left the Texan valley bound for New Mexico.

"And as he tottered northward across the endless sands,
His blood-shot eyes still shading with thin and blistered hands,
Sudden from out the desert, up to the cloudless skies,
A vast and awful figure the traveler saw arise.

"It was the watery mirage. There shimmer to his view
Fleecy cascades down falling and lakes of deepest blue.
But though he strives to reach them, and desperate staggers on,
Ever a step beyond him the vision is withdrawn.

"Ever before him hovers, and seems to bar the way,
The Phantom of the Pecos, a cloud of dusty gray;
Its mocking eyes glare on him, and through the fervid air
Its voice of doom makes answer to his question of despair.

"The dying wanderer listens the Phantom speak his name,
And moves his crackling lips in vain one piteous prayer to frame;
And the awful vision mutters on the salt sand as he sinks,
'Don't you think that it's a long time—a long time between drinks?'"

The General started from his chair
  As he had felt a wound.
"Captain," he said, "you're right, I swear—
  Send the decanter round."

A THRILLING INCIDENT.

In the winter of 1876 I had occasion to go from Green Bay to Chicago on the N. W. railway. At Oshkosh we were joined by a delegation of lawyers on their way to Madison, the capital, to attend the Legislature, then in session. They were all men of more than usual intellect, and of exceptional character. Two were ex-Judges of the Circuit Court, and one I had seen Chairman of the Young Men's Christian Association. The party found seats near together, and after the salutations were over and the news duly discussed they began to look about for means to while away the time. After awhile some one proposed a game of cards. No sooner said than done. Two seats were turned apart so as to face each other, a cushion improvised for a table, and three of our lawyers, including the Chairman of the Young Men's Christian Association, and a Chicago runner, on good terms with them, were soon deep in the mysteries of a game of euchre.

I was surprised to see Christian gentlemen and Judges of law and equity, leaders of society, makers of public sentiment, lawgivers for a great State, directors of public morals, supposed to be public exemplars of all that is good and guides to the young, thus setting publicly their seal of approval to a most dangerous and evil practice. To be sure they played for stakes no higher than the cigars for the party. But it seems to me that, in the eyes of all discreet persons, this does not change the act nor lessen the danger of its example, but rather heightens it; as from the less to the greater is the invariable course of crime. But I did not intend to moralize on paper, but was about to say that while I was filled with such thoughts as these one of the party grew tired of the game, and our remaining Judge was invited to take his place. I saw the blood mount in an honest blush of disapproval to his manly face, and he hesitated and drew back. But the game had become interesting and his excited companions urged him. "Come, Judge, take a hand," they cried, "we can't go on without you." So the Judge slowly rose from his seat, inwardly condemning the act as I evidently saw, and stepping forward took a seat among the players and the game went on.

I had noticed an old lady in a seat to the rear of the players, who had got on board at Menasha, I believe. Gray and bent with age, she had sat abashed, and, with eyes closed, seemed asleep most of the time, until the train, stopping at Oshkosh, took on board the company of lawyers. She then underwent a change, and became greatly interested in the company, looking from one to the other, as if she recognized them all, or was trying to recall their faces. When the game of cards was started she became very restless, would hitch uneasily about in her seat, take up the hem of her faded apron and nervously bite the threads. Once or twice I thought she wiped her eyes under her "Shaker bonnet," but could not tell. She acted so strangely, I became more interested in her than in the players, and watched her closely. She got up after a time and tottered forward, holding on to the seats as she passed. She brushed against Judge —— in passing, but he had become interested in the game and did not notice her. Reaching the water tank at last, she drank a cup of water, and took a seat near the door, with her back to the players. But she did not long remain there; rising again with difficulty, she tottered back toward her former seat, but reaching the players she passed directly in front of them, and, now greatly excited, threw back her bonnet from her face and looked around the company. Her action at once arrested their attention, and pausing in their play they all looked up inquiringly.

Gazing directly in the face of Judge ——, she said in a tremulous voice, "Do you know me, Judge ——?"

"No, mother, I don't remember you," said the Judge, pleasantly. "Where have we met?"

"My name is Smith," said she; "I was with my poor boy three days, off and on, in the court-room in Oshkosh, when he was tried for—for—for robbing somebody, and you are the same man that sent him to prison for ten years, and he died there last June."

All faces were now sobered, and the passengers began to gather around and stand up, all over the car, to listen and see what was going on. She did not give the Judge time to answer her, but, becoming more and more excited, she went on: "He was a good boy, if you did send him to jail. He helped us clear the farm, and when father was took sick and died he done all the work, and we was getting along right smart, till he took to going to town and got to playing keards and drinking, and then, somehow, he didn't like to work after that, but used to stay out often till mornin', and he'd sleep so late, and I couldn't wake him when I knowed he'd been out so late the night afore. And then the farm kinder run down, and then we lost the team: one of them got killed when he'd bin to town one awful cold night. He stayed late, and I suppose they had got cold standin' out, and got skeered and broke loose, and run most home, but run agin the fence and a stake run into one of 'em, and when we found it the next mornin' it was dead, and the other was standin' under the shed. An' so after awhile he coaxed me to let him sell the farm and buy a house and lot in the village, and he'd work at carpenter work. And so I did, as we couldn't do nothin' on the farm. But he grew worse than ever, and after awhile he couldn't get any work, and wouldn't do anything but gamble and drink all the time. I used to do everything I could to get him to quit and be a good, industrious boy again, but he used to get mad after awhile, and once he struck me, and then in the morning I found that he had taken what little money there was left of the farm, and had run off. After that I got along as well as I could, cleanin' house for folks, and washin', but I didn't hear nothing of him for four or five years; but when he got arrested and was took up to Oshkosh for trial, he writ to me."

By this time there was not a dry eye in the car, and the cards had disappeared. The old lady herself was weeping silently and speaking in snatches. But, recovering herself, she went on:

"But what could I do? I sold the house and lot to get money to hire a lawyer, and I believe he is here somewhere," looking around. "Oh, yes, there he is, Mr. ——," pointing to Lawyer ——, who had not taken part in the play. "And this is the man, I am sure, who argued agin him," pointing to Mr. ——, the District Attorney. "And you Judge ——, sent him to prison for ten years; s'pose it was right, for the poor boy told me that he really did rob the bank, but he must have been drunk, for they had all been playing keards most all night and drinking. But, oh! dear, it seems to be kinder as though if he hadn't got to playing keards he might a been alive yet. But when I used to tell him it was wrong and bad to play, he used to say, 'Why, mother, everybody plays now. I never bet only for the candy, or the cigars, or something like that.' And when we heard that the young folks played keards down to Mr. Culver's donation party, and Squire Ring was goin' to get a billiard table for his young folks to play on at home, I couldn't do nothing at all with him. We used to think it awful to do that way when I was young, but it jist seems to me as if everybody nowadays was goin' wrong into something or other. But maybe it isn't right for me to talk to you, Judge, in this way, but it jist seemed to me as if the very sight of those keards would kill me, Judge; I thought if you only knew how I felt, you would not play on so; and then to think, right here before all these young folks! Maybe, Judge, you don't know how younger folks, especially boys, look up to such as you; and then I can't help thinking that, maybe that if them that ought to know better than to do so, and them as are higher larnt, and all that wouldn't set sich examples, my poor Tom would be alive and caring for his poor old mother; but now there ain't any of my family left but me and my poor little gran'chile, my dead darter's little girl, and we are going to stop with my brother in Illinoy."

Tongue of man or angel never preached a more eloquent sermon than that gray, withered old lady, trembling with old age, excitement and fear that she was doing wrong. I can't recall half she said, as she, poor, lone, beggared widow, stood before those noble-looking men, and pleaded the cause of the rising generation.

The look they bore as she poured forth her sorrowful tale was indescribable. To say that they looked like criminals at the bar, would be a faint description. I can imagine how they felt. The old lady tottered to her seat, and, taking her little grand child in her lap, hid her face on her neck. The little one stroked her gray hair with one hand and said: "Don't cry, ganma, don't cry, granma." Eyes unused to weeping were red for many a mile on that journey. And I can hardly believe that one who witnessed that scene ever touched a card again. It is but just to say that when the passengers came to themselves they generously responded to the Judge, who, hat in hand, silently passed through her little audience.—Presbyterian Banner.

MY experience makes me an enemy alike to premature marriage and to distant engagements. The first adds to our individual cares the responsibility for the beloved and helpless pledges of our affections, and the last are liable to the most cruel disappointments.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR.

CATARRH.—Those who in the cold and in the fogs wish to avoid catarrh should be careful to inspire only through the nose. With most this will require practice, but it will be well repaid. Those who are specially anxious to preserve their voices—as preachers, singers and Judges—stand in special need of this precaution, which is as effective as it is simple, and has many and great advantages over all the artificial respirators yet invented.

NEURALGIA.—Prevalence of neuralgia, or what commonly goes by that name, should be regarded as a warning indicative of a low condition of health, which must necessarily render its subjects peculiarly susceptible to the invasion of the diseases of an aggressive type. It is always essential that the vital forces should be vigorous, and the nerve power, in especial, in full development; but neuralgia indicates a low or depressed state of vitality—a poor and weak state, and should be promptly placed under treatment.

AN ARTICLE FOR THE SICK-ROOM.—One of the most convenient articles to be used in the sick-room is the sand-bag. Get some clean fine sand, dry it thoroughly in a kettle on the stove; make a bag, about eight inches square, of flannel, fill it with dry sand, sew the opening carefully together, and cover the bag with cotton or linen cloth. This will prevent the sand from sifting out, and will also allow of the bag being heated quickly by placing it in the oven or even on the top of the stove. After once using it, the possessor will never again attempt to warm the hands or feet of a sick person with a bottle of hot water or a brick. The sand holds the heat a long time, and the bag can be tucked up to the back without hurting the invalid. It is a good plan to make two or three of the bags and keep them ready for use.

A COLD IN THE EYE.—This is a very common affection, and consists of an inflamed condition of the membrane covering the eyeball and lining the eyelids, and is often due, as the name implies, to exposure to a draught. The patient feels as if some dust had got into the eye, and can sometimes hardly be persuaded to the contrary; the white of the eye itself is seen to be reddened, and there is a constant flow of blinding and scalding tears. The best treatment is to foment the eyes with pure warm water, or better with water in which two or three crushed poppy heads have been boiled for half an hour to extract their sedative qualities. A shade should be worn over the eyes during the intervals of fomenting, and a dose of rhubarb and magnesia should be administered. If the inflammation does not subside in a day or two a doctor should be consulted if possible; but if this is not possible good will probably be done by dropping into the eyes two or three times a day some solution of sulphate of zinc or white vitriol, in the proportion of one grain to two table-spoonfuls of water.

MANAGEMENT OF SICK CHILDREN.—The vicissitudes necessarily incident to a primitive and outdoor mode of life are never the first causes of any disease, though they may often betray its presence. Bronchitis, nowadays perhaps the most frequent of infantile diseases, makes no exception to this rule; a draught of cold air may reveal the latent progress of the disorder, but its cause is long confinement in a vitiated and overheated atmosphere, and its proper remedy ventilation and a mild, phlegm-loosening diet, warm sweet milk, sweet oatmeal porridge, or honey water. Select an airy bedroom and do not be afraid to open the windows; among the children of the Indian tribes who brave in open tents the terrible winters of the Hudson bay territory, bronchitis, croup and diphtheria are wholly unknown, and what we call "taking cold" might often be described as taking hot; glowing stoves, and even open fires, in a night nursery, greatly aggravate the pernicious effects of an impure atmosphere. The first paroxysm of croup can be promptly relieved by very simple remedies—fresh air and a forward and backward movement of the arms, combined in urgent cases with the application of a flesh brush or piece of flannel to the neck or upper part of the chest. Paregoric and poppy sirup stop the cough by lethargizing the irritability and thus preventing the discharge of the phlegm till its accumulation produces a second and far more dangerous paroxysm. These second attacks of croup (after the administration of palliatives) are generally the fatal ones. When the child is convalescing, let him beware of stimulating food and overheated rooms. Do not give aperient medicines; costiveness as an after effect of pleuritic affections will soon yield to fresh air and a vegetable diet.

The Habit of Saving.

Children who have a little money ought to practice saving something. Many boys and girls of to-day hardly know a higher use for any money that comes into their hands than spending it for some foolish thing as quickly as possible. To such a lesson in self-denial and economy is very important. As go the boy's pennies and dimes, so, very likely, will go the man's dollars and hundreds by and by. Without having the spirit of a miser, the person accustomed to save has more pleasure in laying up than a spendthrift ever knows.

The way to keep money is to earn it fairly and honestly. Money so obtained is pretty certain to abide with its possessor. But money that is inherited, or that in any way comes without a fair and just equivalent, is almost certain to go as it came. The young man who begins by saving a few dollars a month and thriftily increases his store—every coin being a representative of good, solid work, honestly and manfully done—stands a better chance to spend the last half of his life in affluence and comfort, than he who, in his haste to become rich, obtains money by dashing speculations, or the devious means which abound in the foggy region lying between fair dealing and actual fraud. Among the wisest and most thrifty men of wealth, the current proverb is, money goes as it comes. Let the young make a note of this, and see that their money comes fairly, that it may long abide with them.—Exchange.

DR. J. H. SCHENCK:

Dear Sir—In the fall of 1871 my son was taken sick, and several of the prominent doctors of this city pronounced his disease Consumption. By their advice I took him South, but the change of climate did him no good. Soon after this Captain Blake, an intimate friend, told me how good your medicines were in such diseases, and advised me to give them a trial. I did so, and he soon began to gain flesh and strength, and finally was entirely cured. I cheerfully recommend your medicines to all who are similarly afflicted. Yours truly,

DR. J. H. SCHENCK, Philadelphia, Pa.:

Dear Sir—Some years ago I was told by several of the best physicians of this county that I had Consumption, and that I could live but a short time. I had all the symptoms—night sweats, a dry cough, with severe pain in my lungs at times, and I was very short of breath with the least exertion. My appetite was very poor, and I became so weak that I was unable to attend to any business. I received no benefit from the remedies given me by physicians, and I was at last induced to try your medicines by reading the certificates of cases published by you. I at once began to improve, and they finally made a perfect cure.

I am now in perfect health, and in active business in this place, where I am well known by all. I have advised many others to use your medicines, and can tell of some wonderful cures made by them, to those who may be interested. I believe that your remedies will cure Consumption, even in its advanced stages, as you claim.

DR. SCHENCK & SON, Philadelphia:

Dear Sirs—I have been cured of what I believe to have been Liver Complaint in its worst form, which, before I got relief, affected my lungs quite seriously. I had used the medicines prescribed by a physician of this place for a long time without benefit before I began to take your remedies. I first heard of them by your advertisement in the Patriot of this place, and, concluding to use them, I purchased a bottle of Pulmonic Syrup and Seaweed Tonic. They gave me great relief, and by the time I had used them up I felt almost well. So I stopped using them for some time, but I soon found that the disease was not broken up. I then got more medicine, and continued using it until I was well.

My symptoms were continuous cough, night sweats, raising of matter streaked with blood, soreness in my lungs and at the pit of my stomach, which was also very much swollen at times. I was so weak that I could not go up-stairs without help, and was confined to the house for many weeks. I was very much reduced in flesh and had no appetite, and nothing I ate seemed to digest.

Since my recovery I have recommended your medicines to a great many; among others, a lady who had what every one supposed to be Consumption of the lungs for four years. She has entirely recovered by the use of them, and is now a strong, healthy woman. I can also refer to others in this place who have been greatly benefited by their use.

Yours truly,

WOONSOCKET, R. I., June 1st, 1881.

The Rev. Joseph S. Lame, Pastor of 18th Street Methodist Episcopal Church of Philadelphia, writes under date of Sept. 1st, 1881:

Five years ago I was a great sufferer from Dyspepsia, Bronchial Affection and Pulmonary trouble. I tried many remedies without receiving any benefit. I was so sick that I thought many times that I should be compelled to give up preaching. I at last procured Dr. Schenck's remedies; in a short time they restored me to perfect health, and I have remained well to this day. I believe them to have great curative properties.

Why I have the Utmost Confidence in Dr. J. H. Schenck and his Medicines.

During the past two years my mother and brother have died of Consumption. I was myself quite unwell most of this time, and when, shortly after their death, I was attacked with cough and severe hemorrhages, I naturally concluded that I was destined to go with the same disease. I immediately consulted a physician who made a specialty of lung disease. After examining me, he said that he thought my lungs were [illegible] and that I would soon recover. In less than a week after this I had another severe hemorrhage. Thinking that my physician had made a mistake in my case, I consulted another doctor. He thought my lungs affected, and [illegible] for one [illegible] long time. I got no better under his treatment, but generally worse. My cough was very bad, my appetite entirely gone, I had severe pain in my right side, and for months I did not sleep more than two or three hours in a night. My tongue was heavily coated, and I had a bad taste in my mouth. I had the headache almost all the time.

Feeling that something must be done, I at last concluded to consult with Dr. Schenck, the physician who, I think, I have good reason to believe to be the best in the treatment of lung disease. I went to his office in Boston and was examined. He found my left lung quite badly diseased and my liver seriously affected. He told me that I could be cured if I would follow his directions. Of course I consented to do so, and I very soon saw that my confidence in his ability was well placed. I took the Mandrake Pills, Seaweed Tonic and Pulmonic Syrup all at one time, as directed by him, and within one month my worst symptoms were gone. I went to see the doctor on his next visit to Boston, which was one month after the first time I saw him, and he said, "Only continue with the medicine and you will surely get well." I did so, and kept on gaining in every way until I was perfectly well and able to work as usual. Since my recovery I have not lost a day's time except when I have made friendly visits to the doctor at his Boston office. My cough is gone, my appetite is good, I have no headache or pain in my side, I sleep better than I ever did in my life, and my lungs are apparently healed, as I have no hemorrhages.

These are the reasons why I believe in and recommend Dr. J. H. Schenck and his medicines. He did just what he said he would do for me, and I believe that I owe my life to his medicine and care.

FRED F. TRULL.

HUDSON, Mass., May 25th, 1881.

Hereditary Consumption Cured.

DR. SCHENCK:

Dear Sir—In the autumn of 1877 I had a severe cough, with terrible pain in my sides and between my shoulders. I had very little appetite, and what little I could eat only distressed me. I consulted physicians, who said my condition was a very bad one, and gave me five different cough syrups and tonics, from which I received no benefit, but seemed to grow worse, and kept losing flesh and strength. I had night sweats, and sweat most of the time during the day. I coughed and raised blood and a salt, foamy phlegm; my throat was filled with ulcers, I could hardly swallow; sometimes I could not speak a loud word for weeks; my lungs grew more painful every day with difficult breathing, while pleurisy pains would almost stop my breath. I had colic pains, sour stomach and vomiting up everything I ate. My whole body was filled with pain. I could not lie down, but had to recline in a sitting posture to breathe.

I gave up and did not think of ever getting up again, as it was hard moving myself; my feet and ankles began to swell badly, and my hips had given out long before.

In this sinking condition I thought I would try your remedy for consumption; it might do me some good; it could do me no harm, for I was certain I could not live a month longer the way I was.

At that time—May, 1878—I procured your Pulmonic Syrup, Seaweed Tonic and Pills, and took them as directed. In a week I was better, and began to throw off from the lungs a greenish-yellow matter streaked with blood.

I could eat a little without throwing it up, the pains in my sides were not so severe, I could sleep an hour very soundly, and that was what I had not done for three months.

I took your medicines steadily six months, my cough got better, I did not sweat so bad at nights, kept gaining slowly, and in a year after I began your medicines I could say I felt well.

I began to gain flesh, and last September weighed one hundred and thirty-five pounds, fifteen pounds more than I ever weighed before in my life.

Your medicines, I know, saved my life; and I would say, from my own experience, to all consumptives, take Dr. Schenck's medicines, for they will certainly cure you.

I had Consumption; it is hereditary in our family, my father and two brothers having died of it.

I have had better health the past winter than for ten years previous. Yours respectfully,

MRS. SARAH A. CARTER.

CARLISLE, Mass., April 8th, 1880.

From Mr. Peter Christopher, of Pawnee, Ill.

DR. J. H. SCHENCK & SON, Philadelphia:

Gentlemen—If you will excuse the liberty, I would like to state to you how your medicines have cured me of what seemed a fatal case of Consumption.

Three years ago I was taken sick, and was told by my physicians—who were many and from all parts—that I could not live three months. I took, besides all their prescriptions, at least seventy-five bottles of Cod-Liver Oil. At last, after everything else had proven fruitless, I wrote to you to send me ten bottles of your medicine; to which you replied, advising me, for the sake of economy, to get it of the nearest druggist, which I did; and, after having taken two bottles, my cough, which had been very violent, became easier; my friends, who had been despondent, became encouraged, as I was, and I continued taking the medicine.

I had coughed up immense quantities of blood and was very much reduced, weighing less than one hundred pounds. To-day I am well and hearty; my weight has increased to one hundred and eighty pounds. It is, without doubt, to your medicines that I owe my life. I have no hesitation in declaring that they possess all the qualities you claim for them, and more too. I am still using them in my family as a preventive, for I have had no sickness for a long time. Yours respectfully,

PETER CHRISTOPHER.

PAWNEE, Ill., June 13, 1875.

DR. J. H. SCHENCK, Philadelphia, Pa.:

Dear Sir—Seeing one of your agents distributing your books in this village a few days ago, has reminded me of the past, and has made me feel that I ought to acknowledge with gratitude the benefit I once received from your medicines.

I was a soldier in the army from [illegible] to [illegible], and when mustered out was in a crippled state, having had, during my service, scurvy and camp fever, which, with the malaria of the swamps in which much of our operations were carried on, left me diseased all over. I was soon attacked with chronic diarrhea and a constant, hacking cough. My whole nervous system was completely prostrated. I was apparently fast approaching the grave. In looking over the newspapers to find something advertised that would do me good, I found the advertisement of your medicines. Though I had but little faith, I bought the Syrup and Tonic, and commenced their use. I soon found that what you said of your medicines was true, for they worked an entire revolution in my system—my cough gradually grew less, until it disappeared altogether, as did also my diarrhea and other alarming symptoms, and I was entirely cured.

I shall always hold in grateful remembrance two things—the "Cooper-Shop" Free-Refreshment Saloon for Soldiers, of Philadelphia, and Dr. Schenck's Medicines, of Philadelphia. I believe the medicines saved my life, as I have stated. Pardon the late acknowledgment of the great benefit I have received from you.

Your obedient servant,

MANDRAKE PILLS!

Do not produce sickness at the stomach, nausea or griping. On the contrary, they are so mild and agreeable in their action that a person suffering with a sick headache, sour stomach or pain in the bowels is speedily relieved of these distressing symptoms. They act directly on the liver, the organ which, when in a healthy condition, purifies the blood for the whole body.

They are a perfect preparation of that great and well-known remedy, Mandrake or Podophyllin, a remedy that has displaced the use of mercury, as well as many other poisonous drugs, in the practice of every intelligent physician.

Prof. John King, of the College of Medicine, of Cincinnati, says: "In Constipation it acts upon the bowels without disposing them to subsequent costiveness. In Chronic Liver Complaint there is not its equal in the whole range of medicines, being vastly more useful than mercurial agents, arousing the liver to healthy action, increasing the flow of bile, and keeping up these actions longer than any other agent with which we are acquainted." (See American Dispensatory, page 731.)

In all cases of Liver Complaint or Dyspepsia, where there is a general weakness or debility, Dr. Schenck's Seaweed Tonic should be used in connection with these Pills.

Growth of Our Live Stock and Dairy Interests.

By the statistical returns of the census of 1880 there are in the United States 10,356,996 horses, 1,814,108 mules, 999,092 working oxen, 12,442,137 milch cows, 22,468,562 other cattle, 51,183,908 sheep, and 47,688,371 swine. Of these the increase has been in milch cows between 1870 and 1880 from 8,935,332 to 12,412,137; of other cattle from 13,566,005 to 22,466,562. The aggregate of cattle in 1870 was 23,830,008, and in 1880, 35,877,791; an increase of 12,057,183. In the ten Northwestern States the increase has been quite extraordinary in the last ten years:

Michigan	250,859	384,578
Ohio	654,390	767,044
Indiana	396,726	504,944

Nebraska	28,940	161,606
Total	[illegible]	5,271,881

Or an increase of 63.3 per cent. Ten years ago there were no more than 3,000,000 milch cows in the ten States of the Ohio valley and the trans-Mississippi. There has been in ten years in this territory an increase of more than 2,000,000. The enlargement of dairy interests in the West has been double that of the East. In 1870 the aggregate amount produced annually was: Of butter, 514,092,983 pounds; of cheese, 53,492,153 pounds; milk, 235,500,599 gallons sold in the market and to factories. In 1880 the product of the dairy had increased nearly threefold, and milk had increased more than twofold.

In Michigan the yield in 1870 was: Butter, 24,400,185 pounds; in 1880, about 73,200,355; cheese, 670,804 pounds; in 1880, 2,012,412; milk, 2,277,822 gallons; in 1880, 4,855,644.

In Ohio in 1870; Butter, 50,266,372 pounds; in 1880, 100,583,754; cheese, in 1870, 8,169,048 pounds; in 1880, 24,507,144; milk, in 1870, 22,275,304 gallons; in 1880, 44,550,608.

In Indiana, in 1870, butter, 22,905,385 pounds; in 1880, 68,846,155; cheese, in 1870, 283,807 pounds; in 1880, 851,421; milk, in 1870, 936,983 gallons; in 1880, 1,873,966.

In Iowa, in 1870, butter, 25,519,179 pounds; in 1880, about 76,536,537; cheese, in 1870, 1,087,741 pounds; in 1880, 3,251,523; milk, in 1870, 588,800 gallons; in 1880, 1,377,600.

Reminiscences.

There is an old chest of drawers—an heir-loom. It is full of the dead years, laid away with withered rose-leaves and lavender. A grandmother's cap, a mother's wedding-comb, my own wedding-dress, a deep crape veil, worn for father and mother; baby frocks, shoes, and little pants, barlow knives, a school-girl album, full of forgotten names—names covered with lichens, in the only other place where they still remain, and old letters—great bundles of them. How these old letters comfort me oftentimes! No matter how the writers have changed, these words live. Mother, father, brothers, friends and lover, remain unchanged in the drawer among the withered roses of long ago. I will not weary you with the tale of the sorrows borne, the joys shared, in my own south room, overlooking the garden, so fair with flowers, or of the guest room, sacred to friendship. But there are tears and smiles for both, with all of the rest. Before I tell you good-bye at the door, let us go down, and sit for a moment in the dining-room. Ah! the good cheer that has smoked on that long table. The many times I have stood with tired body, but swelling heart over its tempting array. Each birthday, through all the years, from the first one when the baby began to talk, to the last one who left a bearded man, has been remembered in this room. How the brown turkeys, flanked by oysters and cranberries, have steamed on thanksgiving days—although we are Western folk—and what exultation has the room resounded with, on Christmas and New Year's, when not only the best cheer of winter, but love gifts, from and to, each and all, piled up the tables, and chairs. As I talk of it in its near recurrence, the old feeling comes back, and I feel as if all the dear little people were only out, at school, perhaps, and would burst in presently, to question and talk eagerly of the good things coming.

Oh yes, a woman's life is often a poem, and her home its binding, bright and gilded in youth, dark and worn with use in age!—M. E. Banta in Indianapolis Herald.

Punctuation.

Punctuation is an art, and one that has been learned in comparatively modern times. The Greeks did not know the meaning of it, and left no space between their words. The Romans put up a kind of division without any apparent method. Up to the end of the fifteenth century only the colon and the comma were introduced, and the latter at that time only as a perpendicular figure. We are indebted to Aldus Manutius, an eminent printer, for the comma as we have it now, and in 1790 he introduced the semi-colon into printing, and published a set of rules for the guidance of writers. It is not known by whom notes of interrogation or exclamation were first used, but inverted commas ("") were brought into common use by a French printer to supersede the use of italics but the English adopted them to specify quotation.

On the death of the Emperor Otho, who is said to have killed himself to avoid being the cause of a civil war, some of his soldiers, filled with grief and admiration, killed themselves before his corpse.

At the time of the introduction of postage stamps by Sir Rowland Hill, he estimated that the increase of letters posted on the 14th of February, was not less than half a million throughout the United Kingdom.

The triple wall which formerly surrounded Constantinople, and which finally fell before Mahomet II., formed an almost impregnable defence. The present Sultan must have its value in mind, as he is having his own palace and garden surrounded by three similar walls.

When Pope Pius IX. died in 1878, he bequeathed to his successor the conflict with Russia defeat of the French ultramontanes, opposition against Italy and Germany. The situation has now changed. Russia and Germany desire peace with the Vatican. The relations of the Pope to Italy and France are not greatly changed, although the former treats the Vatican as a municipal affair, and the French government has drifted into almost open hostility with it.

Poor Boys Who Have Become Presidents.

The second President of the United States, John Adams, was the son of a farmer of moderate means, who was compelled to work constantly for the support of his family. When at the age of twenty-one, the son graduated at Harvard College, his education was his own capital for his start in life.

Andrew Jackson was born in a log hut in extreme poverty. He grew up in the woods of North Carolina, living in the home of a relative, where his mother worked to support herself and her three children.

James K. Polk, the eleventh President, spent his early years on a new farm in the wilderness of North Carolina. His father placed him in a store, with the intention that he should enter mercantile life: but his dislike for business was so great that, at the age of eighteen, he was sent to the Murfreesborough Academy to fit for college.

Millard Fillmore was the son of a New York farmer, and his home was an humble one. When he was fourteen years old he was sent away from home to learn the business of a clothier. But five years latter he entered a law office, and at the age of twenty-three he was admitted to the bar.

James Buchanan was born in a small town of the Alleghany Mountains. His father was poor, and by his own ax built his home in the wilderness. When James was eight years old he was placed at school, and six years latter entered Dickinson College where he graduated with the highest honors.

It is well known that Abraham Lincoln was the son of parents who were the poorest of the poor. Till he was more than twenty-one his home was a log cabin. His attendance at school was limited to a few months. From early life he was compelled to depend on himself not only for his living, but also for his success in his business and his profession.

At the age of ten Andrew Johnson was apprenticed to a tailor. Previously his mother had supported him by her own labor. He was never able, it is said, to attend school. His education he gained by his own efforts at night, after working all day at his trade, and by the help of his wife.

The early home of General Grant, also on the banks of the Ohio, more than fifty years ago, was without many of the comforts of civilized life. Till he was seventeen, when he was sent to West Point, he lived the life of a common boy in a common home.

James A. Garfield, like so many of his predecessors, was born in a log hut. When he had hardly entered his teens he was doing a man's work in the harvest field. He learned the carpenter's trade. He worked on the Ohio Canal. He was determined, however, to have an education, and, leaving his plane and scythe, he worked his way through the preparatory school, and, with some help from friends, was able to graduate at Williams College.

The lives of many of the Presidents prove that no boy is so poor but that he may hope to attain the highest honors which the American people can give.

Newfoundland.

As England's oldest colony Newfoundland is worthy of notice. Discovered in the reign of Henry VII. and incorporated with the realm during the time of Elizabeth, its history is replete with curious facts and abounds in instances which illustrate the difficulties which are to be contended against in the colonization of a new district. According to the accounts left by those who were among the first to visit the new acquisition, the land was fruitful, the fishing wonderfully fine, and the presence of mineral ores which were discovered in the soil promised much for the subsequent prosperity and wealth of the country island. A railway in the interior, a system of general education and other modernizing modifications have been successfully introduced. As regards its mineral wealth Newfoundland now occupies the sixth place in the list of copper-producing regions, and other minerals, such as gold, silver, nickel, lead and iron ore, are found in moderate quantities. The fisheries are, however, the important object.

How Rugs Are Made.

How many who stop to admire the show windows of our carpet dealers know how the rug is made? That it is woven somehow is all that is apparent as it lies there, warm, soft, bright with a dozen colors, fruit, birds or figures. The rug is twice woven, and this is its history: First, the border and center that is to form the pattern is designed; then painted in straight lines upon paper containing a ruled scale, and in the proper colors that are afterward to appear on the rug. This paper rug is then cut up into strips, each containing two spaces of the scale, and these papers are the pattern that the first or weft weaver is to follow. In weaving weft a warp beam of say 200 threads in width, and a wheep beam of 100 threads in width are required. Two threads of the first and one of the second pass through the same split in the reed at regular intervals of, say one-third of an inch, the intervening splits of the reed being empty. The paper pattern is fastened to the middle of the work, and the weaver follows it exactly as it is painted; that is, the pattern may need six threads of crimson, two of black, twelve of ecru, ten of green olive, and so on, the weaver filling the "spot" exactly as to length and color. Having woven the full length of the paper as painted on the left-hand space the paper is begun again and the painting in the right-hand space is followed and when all the papers which, laid side by side, form the rug, have been thus gone over the weft for the rug is finished. The roll of weft-cloth is then run through the cutting machine, a 10-inch cylinder, around which a continuous thread of knife blades is wound. The cylinder is revolved at a high rate of speed, and the weft-cloth, passing within range of the knifes, is cut into strips by them. These strips do not unravel, because, in weaving, the wheep-thread, is twisted about the two warp-threads and the filling is locked in. After twisting each strip to change it from being a flat thread into a round thread, it is wound upon a bobbin, and is ready for the second weaver, who is called the setter.

The warp of the rug is black flax; and the setter uses two shuttles, alternately—a small one, containing a bobbin of two-ply or three-ply flax, and a large one for the unwieldy bobbin of weft. A white thread on each side, and one in the middle of the black wrap are the guides to the setter, who sees that certain parts of the weft-thread come under those white threads before he presses the weft in. Each bobbin of weft will weave about three inches of the rug; so, if the rug is one yard long it will require twelve bobbins, which mean twelve pieces of weft-cloth, to complete it. But these twelve pieces, having each been cut up into ninety-six identical strips, will make ninety-six similar rugs. Therefore should the weft-weaver put in, say, eight threads (one-half inch in length) of a wrong color or shade, that error would appear in ninety-six rugs. The setter having finished the ninety-six sets of twelve bobbins, the rugs are ready for finishing. The machine through which they pass cuts the surface off evenly, and brushes them free of fragments of the materials used. This treatment brings out every detail of the design and heightens the colors. Most of the rugs made here are of flax and wool; others are of silk and shoddy silk. The weft for the silk rugs has eight strips to the inch, and to cut it requires 288 knife blades, each one of which must have a razor edge. The weft cloth and the blades must be set to a nicety, since the variation of the sixteenth of an inch would make the knives cut the 288 threads instead of the filling between the threads. There is a firm in Glasgow, Scotland, who manufacture for the royal houses of Europe such elaborate designs, as the Lord's supper, the weft-weaver, in some cases, using 400 different shuttles.

Rev. Whangdoodle Baxter Insulted.

The Rev. Whangdoodle Baxter, an Austin colored clergyman, wished to hint to Uncle Nace, who is his near neighbor, that a gift of a cord of firewood would be very gratefully accepted. Uncle Nace by the way does not like Whangdoodle much. Finally, says Whangdoodle, insinuatingly, "Uncle Nace, I'se gwine ter be powerful hard up for firewood dis winter. Can't yer give me a load?"

Uncle Nace looked all around as if he was afraid of being overheard, and then he said—

"Parson, is you werry pertickler whar de wood comes from?"

Parson Whangdoodle supposed this to mean that Uncle Nace was going to give him some stolen wood, so he replied:

"Uncle Nace, as long as I gets de wood, I don't keer much where it comes from."

"Den Parson you don't keer whose wood you burns up."

"Hit's all de same ter me, Uncle Nace."

"Well, I am gwine," said Nace.

"War is ye gwine?"

A Productive Battle Ground.

Hundreds and thousands of old soldiers, both Confederate and Federal, will remember Missionary ridge, near Chattanooga. It is the site of one of most decisive battles of the war—ragged, rocky, steep, poor in soil as any part of the table land, and was, until recently, regarded as worthless. For what purpose men held it was not known by themselves, or anybody else. Three or four years ago its lands would not bring over $2 or $4 an acre. Now the ridge is covered with orchards, and the profits are such that no land can be bought for less than $40 or $50 an acre. It is thus old ideas give way before new conditions and new infusions of brains and energy.

A young attorney, having delivered himself in a speech in court, asked the clerk if he could smoke in the room. "Yes," was the reply. A pipe was hauled out and the gentleman was busily engaged in building columns in the air, when the Judge laid a fine of $5 upon him. "I thought you said I could smoke here?" inquired he indignantly of the clerk as soon as he got his breath. "I did," was the reply, as that busy officer proceeded with his minutes, "didn't you smoke?"

Adventures of a Baby.

The Kingston (N. Y.) Freeman relates the experience of a young mother in that town with her first baby. The mother, it seems, had been reared in luxury, and was lacking in practical experience: "She undertook to give the child a bath in a small foot tub. The lady's mother, who lives with her, passing through the room, dipped her finger in the water, and told her daughter it was too cold for the little one, and that she would have to warm it. Instead of adding a little warm water, she placed the bath-tub with the baby in it on a small gas stove, and awaited for further developments. The developments came as soon as the bottom of the tub began to get extra warm. The offspring gave one yell, when the fond mother, grandmother and the two servants rushed to the rescue. In the future, grandmother will look after the child, while the mother reads up on the cares of a mother and how to bring up children."

Almost Discouraged!

Such expressions are very common among those afflicted with a Cough or Cold. They have called on the doctor, and he has prescribed. They have used nearly everything which has been recommended, but are no better. Hope abandons them, and they look with distrust upon all medicines. But there is an old family remedy advertised in this paper which possesses true merit. Allen's Lung Balsam will cure your Cough or Cold. Try it, and you will receive new hope and a perfect cure. It is pleasant to take and perfectly harmless. The city druggists all sell it.

RESCUED FROM DEATH.

William J. Coughlin, of Somerville, Mass., says: In the fall of 1876 I was taken with bleeding of the lungs, followed by a severe cough. I lost my appetite and flesh, and was confined to my bed. In 1877 I was admitted to the hospital. The doctors said I had a hole in my lung as big as a half dollar. At one time a report went around that I was dead. I gave up hope, but a friend told me of Dr. William Hall's Balsam for the Lungs. I got a bottle, when, to my surprise, I commenced to feel better, and to-day I feel better than for three years past. I write this hoping every one afflicted with diseased lungs will take Dr. William Hall's Balsam, and be convinced that consumption can be cured. I can positively say it has done more good than all the other medicines I have taken since my sickness.

DR. BULL'S COUGH SYRUP

A Boston Girl in Chicago.

I feel that I am very far from Boston. I realize that I am many miles nearer the line that separates civilization from the land of savages. And into these Western solitudes I have brought a volume of Herbert Spencer to refresh and cheer my mind. He always fascinates; and the fact of his being still unmarried has something to do with it, for you know there is a halo surrounding the celibate which marriage utterly destroys. As in most philosophical questions, it is useless to ask why this is so. We can only observe the working of the phenomena, but not its cause. But truly, of Spencer I never tire. His ideas of the higher life are so consoling—the development from an "indefinite, incoherent homogeneity to a definite, coherent heterogeneity." What could be truer or more conclusive? Perhaps the illiterate mind might be staggered by the unusual combination of polysyllables, but we who are cultivated can appreciate the subtle significance of a definite, coherent heterogeneity. His ideas of love, however, are not extravagantly tinged with romance. Suppose that a man with tender eyes and raven-hued mustache, having seated himself by your side, should tenderly take your hand in his, and then assure in fervent tones that he is conscious of a molecular change in the vesicular nerve matter of his system, whose concomitant is love, and that you are the external object which has caused the change. Would an ice bath be more chilling? An hysterical woman would certainly lift up her voice and shriek aloud. No wonder that Herbert Spencer has lived to the age of sixty without marrying.

A Good Family Remedy.

STRICTLY PURE.

By its faithful use Consumptives have been cured when other Remedies and Physicians have failed to effect a cure.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion county, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption, and was pronounced Incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes, April 4th, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has Cured his Mother of Consumption after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured; he thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincinnati, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough, and that he was able to resume his practice.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists, Zanesville, Ohio, writes us of the cure of Mathias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who has been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him, as it has many others, of Bronchitis.

A combination of Protoxide of Iron, Peruvian Bark and Phosphorus in a palatable form. The only preparation of Iron that will not blacken the teeth, so characteristic of other iron preparations.

GENTLEMEN: I have used Dr. Harter's Iron Tonic in my practice, and in an experience of twenty-five years in medicine, have never found anything to give the results that Dr. Harter's Iron Tonic does. In many cases of Nervous Prostration, Female Diseases, Dyspepsia, and an impoverished condition of the blood, this peerless remedy, has in my hands, made some wonderful cures. Cases that have baffled some of our most eminent physicians, have yielded to this great and incomparable remedy. I prescribe it in preferance to any iron preparation made. In fact, such a compound as Dr. Harter's Iron Tonic is a necessity in my practice.

We take the following item from one of our exchanges. It seems a little laughable to hear the able editor of the Elkhart Monitor called "young fellows," for although young in years, Mr. S. is not only a mature looking and dignified man; but possesses something of the "Falstaffian" in his figure. But the Wisconsin man starts off like this: "A young man at Elkhart, Ind., has started a six column weekly paper with the avowed object of "restoring to the public its wonted grandeur and prosperity." You can't do it young fellow. We tried for six years to restore the Republic to its wonted grandeur and prosperity, by publishing the ablest paper in the country, and taking turnips and slab wood on subscription, and never had money enough to buy a dog, but late years we have let the wonted grandeur of the Republic shirk for itself, and the first of January we had six dollars."

The following interesting item of Washington news we copy from the Cincinnati Times-Star: "Visitors at the Capital yesterday were treated to a very interesting test of the acoustics of the rotunda and dome. While people were hurrying to and fro along the rotunda, there suddenly broke upon their ears delicous melody from a thrilling contralto voice, and all paused, curious to know from whence the music came. After a little time they became conscious of the fact that some one was singing in the apex of the dome, and as the rich familiar air of "Suwanee River" echoed and reverberated through the vast structure all bustle ceased and the listeners were held breathless spellbound. Though the singer was elevated hundreds of feet above their heads, the song rendered was clearly audible and each word as distinct as though delivered from the stage of a place of public amusement, and the echoes were marvelously perfect, lingering long after the lips of the singer were closed. The possessor of the wondrous voice was a lady member of a party of visitors. Neither her friends nor the artiste herself would furnish her name nor any fact as to her identity, except that they came to Washington on a flying trip of sight-seeing from Baltimore yesterday morning. The fair singer was heartily applauded.

Congress is still working up the investigation of Sherman's record while secretary of the treasury. Pitney, the custodian of the treasury, it will be remembered, testified that Sherman had employed workmen to do work on his new residence, and had paid them out of public money of the United States known as the contingent fraud. As Sherman has been trying to disprove this, Pitney has been put upon the stand again and stated that he was prepared to prove not only that his statements were correct, but that Mr. and Mrs. Sherman both knew that these men had been paid out of the public treasury, this caused some excitement and brought out the following sharp dialogue:

Senator Hale sprang to his feet and, with indignation, asked: "How dare you charge that Mrs. Sherman knew this?"

Mr. Pitney replied: "Because I received notes from her asking me to send men to do certain work on different occasions, and I have the notes here now."

He then produced certain notes proving to have been written by Mrs. Sherman and requesting that workmen be sent to the Secretary's assistance. Mr. Pitney added that he had received notes from Secretary Sherman and also produced them.

Pitney then entered into details with regard to this work and maintained that he could prove by the books and records of the treasury that the work was paid for out of the contingent fund. The Committee finally decided to call Upton and Lamphere and confront them with Pitney, also to have the books and records of the contingent expenditures present for examination in connection with the testimony. Some of the leading Stalwarts have quietly taken a great deal of interest in this investigation, and great pressure was brought to bear on Senator Logan to persuade him to bring out all testimony calculated to embarrass and injure Senator Sherman. Mr. Logan, however, resisted this pressure on the ground that his personal relations with Sherman had not been very pleasant and agreeable, and that it was known they were not friendly and he did not want to do anything that would give color to the charge that he was actuated by personal motives.

Sanctums.

We clip the following lengthy article entire from the Middlebury Record, and make no excuses for its unusual length, as the sentiment will commend itself to a great many of the fraternity here and elsewhere: "Some of our exchanges are talking about the nice editorial rooms of some of our newspapers, Now we will bet two nickles that we can give any of those nice fellows ten points on looks of sanctums, and then beat them. The Record's editorial room is nicely situated on the second floor, and commands an elegant view of a burnt district covered with rubbish, from the north windows, and all the beauty and poetry that is contained in a solid brick wall on the east and south, while from the north can be seen tall towering hills dotted by trees, residences, waving fields of green, haystacks, and occasionally a few stray cattle, and also a busy street below. The walls of our sanctum are gaily festooned with calendars, patent medicine advertisements, sale bills, samples of job work, pictures of eminent authors, men of the hour, (the Record force among the number, circus posters and other artists, showing the æsthetic taste of the occupant, and interlaid at stated intervals by an ancient cob-web; the floor is richly covered by a beautiful layer of a rich brown dust, into whose luxuriant depths the feet of an intruder sink about two inches, while here and there a half decayed cigar stump rears its head, and by its side may be seen a cud of tobacco that has done good service. On shelves arrayed around the room in not altogether an artistic manner may be seen many things that would strike terror to the stoutest—moralist. On the shelf in the upper left hand corner, just to the right of the life-size oil painting of the beautiful ex-editor of the Record, you can see two bottles: full did did you say? well, not exactly, but they were and so was the person that received them, when they first reached this office. They were presented to the late editor of the Record by his most intimate friend, C. H. Chase of the Elkhart Review, and have ever since been kept as momentums of good feeling between the two. They contained if the Elder's experience is worth anything, beer, and what that is we don't know, but suppose that is used to help write political leaders, and to clean type, or perhaps may be used to clinch a campaign argument. To the right of these articles of war is a shelf and two pipes which we suppose came from the farm of Henry Clay, as the Elder refers to them as "clays." They are used only on great occassions, which is when an irate subscriber comes in to have his paper stopped. They are then taken down and loaded with something that is called tobacco; one of them is then handed to the offended person who after taking a whiff is carried home on a stretcher. Thus you see one of these "clays" can accomplish more than two men could, unless they were Sampsons. To the left of this is a shelf which contains a jug presented to the Record by a friend who has climbed the golden stairs. This jug is kept full at all times—of benzine, which all the brethern know is used to clean type, and to give our democratic friends when they call. On another shelf is a beautiful mahogany box in which is a psalm book, we suppose, as there are fifty two leaves in it, and there is something about kings and queens connected with it, but we don't remember what it is. We suppose the way it came to be in the office is that it was brought here to be bound, and the owner never called for it. There are many other things of lesser note hung around the sanctum, most of which are on file, being statements of accounts from creditors, which we are sorry to say are quite numerous. This is all for this time.

Not a Figurehead.

(From the Burlington, Vt. Free Press.)

While in Boston recently, a representative of this paper went out to Lynn, for the special purpose of seeing if there was such a person living as Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, whose genial face adorns the otherwise tame advertising columns of over six thousand newspapers of the United States. Driving out to No. 225 Western avenue, a bright pleasant home was reached, where, sure enough, was found the veritable Lydia E., looking possibly a trifle thinner than the picture represents, but nevertheless a hale, hearty and sympathetic woman, who has done a great deal for her sex. She religiously devotes her entire time to the personal correspondence with ladies all over the world, who come to her with their troubles, as to an own mother and she is happiest when immersed in the great care and labor which an average of over one hundred letters per day necessarily bring. Two lady clerks assist in writing at her direction. Her son, Chas. H., attends to the manufacturing department, which is a large factory near the house. Her medicines have had a wonderful sale.

SEED.

THE LARGEST IN THE WORLD.

CORN AND WATERMELONS.

CORN. Our "GIANT" Corn is a new and distinct variety, and is withal the best that any farmer ever grew. The grains are as large as the average size chestnut; the finest white dent ever grown; full, rich in starch, perfect, hardy, and never failing to grow a strong and vigorous stalk, with firm, deep roots. The ears are uniform and of very large size. It will yield more than any other variety that can be raised, averaging from THREE to SIX EARS to the stalk. It is taking the place of all other varieties upon its first trial. It is matured, and can be gathered in TEN WEEKS, and grows as successfully in the North as the South.

WATERMELONS. Our "MIXON" Watermelons are the largest and finest in the World in every instance, and grow in any section of the country. Their average weight is from 75 to 125 POUNDS. The flesh is of a blood red, very solid, luscious, crisp and sugary—far surpassing all other varieties, and, although a melon of such an enormous weight, there is barely half an inch rind. They are pronounced the finest shipping melon in the World. It will pay any farmer to try a sample package.

Corn—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00, and $5.00 per bushel. Watermelons—Sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00. Address all orders to the Sacrilegious Scoundrels.

A friendly letter from Rev. George A. Harter, pastor of St. John's church (Lutheran) at Avilla, gives an account of a most flagrant outrage that occurred in that place. Some time last week the corner stone of that church was broken open and all its contents stolen. These consisted of coins of money, medals and such other articles as are usually deposited in the corner stones of churches. It is not known at present who were the perpetrators of this sacrilegious act, but it would appear certain that the motive of the low-lived scoundrels was to secure the small sum of money that had been deposited. What makes the crime still more aggravating, is the fact that the same church was broken into less than a year ago, and its valuable silver altar vessels stolen. Any one who would commit so dastardly an act is a fit man to join the Guiteau procession, which is to take place the thirtieth of next June.

—B. F. Duncan, of Waterloo, was in town Monday.

—Mrs. Ehlers went to Pleasant Lake last week to assist in a protracted meeting in the Baptist church at that place.

—John Leas, of Waterloo, made the COURIER folks a pleasant call this week. He is getting ready for the sale of the Boyer property, which takes place on Saturday.

—The Lagrange Democrat held its first annual picnic and reunion February 11, for the distribution of prizes to such of its patrons as have paid up their subscriptions.

—Blanche Long, daughter of our good-natured townsman, M. F. Long, has been spending a few days visiting her uncle, H. J. Long, of the Standard, at Kendallville.

They go to relieve the men now at Jefferson barracks, near St. Louis, and expect to remain at that post a year or more. But the boys will find that service under Uncle Sam is rather uncertain, and they may be called on to tackle the noble red man on the western plains at any time.

—The Indianian publishes the delinquent tax list for Kosciusko county. It is about ten times as large as the list for this county now running in the Garrett Herald. It may also be noted that Kosciusko county is and has been for lo these many years, under the control of antedeluvian republicans, while our county finances are under the control of live, progressive democrats. They need L. J. Miller over there a little while.

The New Era gives our fellow townsman J. J. Martin the following send off: John B. Pepple has the job of putting in counters and shelving in Alvord's new brick building for the new hardware store that is to be opened there about the first of March. The gentleman who will engage in the business is a Mr. Martin, of Auburn Junction, present station agent at that place. He has had some experience in the business, and we see no good reason why he should not succeed in the business in Albion. He comes highly recommended by those who know him, as a first-class citizen, and such we are always glad to welcome to Albion.

—A false report was circulated last week in regard to the family of Mr. Wm Snell, living in the south part of town. It was reported that one of his children had the scarletina, and his other children were excluded from school. We learn from Dr. [illegible] that the child had nothing more than an attack of inflammatory sore throat and is now quite well. Children of other families have been excluded from school for the same reason, but we are credibly informed that there is no case of scarletina in town, except the one at Dr. Ford's and that in this case the patient is now convalescent. The town is in all respects, as healthy as usual.

Death of Mr. Dickinson.

Died, on Sunday evening, February 12, 1882, Timothy Y. Dickinson, in the 44th year of his age.

Mr. Dickinson was born in Randolph, Portage county, Ohio, October 8, 18[illegible] and removed to this county with his father, the late T. R. Dickinson, in the year 1847. Upon the establishment of a newspaper in Auburn, about the year 1852 he commenced learning the trade of a printer, and he afterwards worked at his trade in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Fort Wayne. On the first Thursday in February, 1859, he published the first of The Waterloo Press, and continued its publication either alone or in connection with the writer until 1865. He served one term, about this time, as County School Examiner. Upon the accession of a Republican administration in 1861, he was appointed Postmaster at Waterloo, and for a time served as Assessor and Collector of Internal Revenue for the county, upon the passage of the internal revenue laws during the Rebellion. In the spring of 1865, he was appointed U. S. Consul to Leipsic, Germany, his commission receiving the last official signature of President Lincoln. He served in that capacity for two years, through the Austro-Prussian war period, and was removed by President Johnson for political reasons. Upon the accession of General Grant to the Presidency, he was appointed to a position in the Interior Department at Washington, and served as private Secretary to Commissioner Van Aernam of the Pension Office, for some time. After he returned from Washington, he was appointed to a Postal Clerkship, and was assigned to work on the through Lake Shore line, from Syracuse to Cleveland. The arduous duties of this position, combined with his desire to excel in the performance of his duties, broke down a not overstrong constitution, and finally, about 2½ years ago he was compelled to quit work entirely. He was held in so high esteem by his Superintendent, that in relieving him he voluntarily pledged himself to again place him upon the line, should his health admit. It was soon found, however, that he was suffering from what physicians term "softening of the brain," partial paralysis followed, and in a few months his mind was entirely destroyed. In time it became impossible to properly care for him in a private family, and Mrs. Dickinson was finally induced to consent to his being taken to the State Asylum for the Insane, at Indianapolis, for care and treatment. This was done about eighteen months ago, and he remained until his death receiving all the care it is possible to give persons in his condition.

Mr. Dickinson was married in April, 1860, to Miss Juliette D. Fox, of Orland, who survives him. There was born to this marriage a son and daughter, both living.—[Waterloo Press.

Obituary.

Mrs. O. T. Clark died at her home in Waterloo last Friday at 10 o'clock a. m. Her death was sudden and unexpected, although she has been sick for about a year and a half. She ate her breakfast, as usual, but soon complaining that she did not feel well, walked into the sitting-room and in a few minutes went from there to her bed. None of the family were at home at the time but her two daughters, Fanny and Lizzie; but noticing something strange about her condition, and being warned by Dr. Chamberlain, who arrived about this time, that she was dying, the family were hastily summoned, coming in time to see her pass quietly away. The deceased was well known to all in this community, was a kind parent, an active member of the Presbyterian church, and always energetic and generous in the performance of good works. The community will miss her as well as mourn her.

We add the following facts in regard to her history: Ellen S. Sanger was born in Troy Vt., Sept. 30, 1829. At the age of fourteen, she removed with her parents to Northwest Ohio. She was united in marriage to O. T. Clark, at Delta, Ohio, April 7, 1853. They moved to this state, locating in Waterloo, where they continued to reside to the time of her death. Six children were born to them, five of whom are still living.

Agricultural Meeting.

Pursuant to call, a meeting was held in Waterloo's hall by the stockholders of the Northeastern Indiana Agricultural Association and others for the purpose of discussing the following propositions:

PUBLIC HIGHWAYS — BEST WAY OF IMPROVING THEM — UNDERDRAINING.

1st—Best material for, and proper dephts to secure best results.
2d—Width between drains.
4th—Size of tile or other material best for practical purposes.
5th—Soil most benefitted by underdraining.

We, the members of the N.-E. I. A. A., and other citizens assembled to take into consideration the construction and maintaining of the public highways. Therefore be it

RESOLVED, That we are in favor of having our roads piked up in a moderate elevation and with a bed of not less than 18 feet wide, and all ditches well cleared out and left in shape, and grade that no water can remain in such ditches.

Inasmuch as there will be no meeting of the directors of this society until April next, therefore be it

RESOLVED, That there be notice given that we recommend that the children's department at the next fair be organized, and liberal premiums awarded for meritorious exhibitions of their skill and labor.

A meeting was appointed at the same place to be held on Thursday, March 2, 1882, at one o'clock p. m., to discuss the question of Stocks.

1st—Which is best for the county [illegible].
2d—Is it advisable they should run at large.

Also other questions in relation thereto.

It is finished off in the best style and with all the latest improvements. The eating house across the street, south of the passenger house, is a little too far away for convenience, but a hungry man will find it, and find a good, warm meal at any time.

Wood is a little plentier here now than it "used to was," but we have not yet heard of any one who had more than enough.

A writer in the Indianapolis Sentinel declares his belief that Northern Indiana is without doubt the most fertile region on the continent. He thinks that if the future of our State were now told, it would not be credited, and that South Bend is one of the wonders of the age. He thinks that improvements are but just commenced, and that in the near future more than 2,000,000 acres of marshy land in Indiana will be redeemed.—[illegible] Banner.

THE ASSASSIN.

Guiteau was brought into the Criminal Court in Washington on the 3d inst., to hear the arguments on the motion for a new trial, and obtained permission to sit beside his counsel. He then undertook to address the Judge, but was promptly suppressed. Mr. Scoville brought forward the charge that newspapers had been furnished the jury, and Mr. Corkhill submitted an affidavit from each member of the jury in denial. Judge Cox said he would announce his decision on the 4th. Guiteau made two interruptions, and realized several dollars from the sale of autographs.

It is stated that the assassin is beginning to show much nervousness and irritability. He is suffering from a severe cold, which has inflamed his eyes. One jail official says he would not be surprised if Guiteau did not live to be hanged.

John W. Guiteau, last evening, spent an hour in his brother's cell, in company with Warden Crocker. The prisoner became very much excited, and denounced his brother and Scoville.

John W. Guiteau, in a card to the public, disavows all knowledge of the proposed exhibition of his brother's body, and says that, whether his brother dies by legal process or in the insane asylum, his body shall be disposed of in a manner that will not offend public decency.

In view of the recent proposition to make a public spectacle of Guiteau's remains, it is thought highly probable that Judge Cox will exercise the discretion given him by the Revised Statutes, and include in the death sentence the disposition of the body.

The Death-Sentence Passed Upon the Assassin.

In the Criminal Court at Washington, on Saturday, Feb. 4, Judge Cox overruled the motion for a new trial in the case of the murderer of President Garfield. Scoville thereupon filed a motion in arrest of judgment. Judge Cox then asked the assassin if he had aught to say why sentence should not be passed upon him. The prisoner arose, pale, but with lips compressed, and desperate determination stamped upon his features. In a low and deliberate tone he began, but soon his manner became wild and violent, and, pounding upon the table, he delivered himself of the following harangue:

I am not guilty of the charge set forth in the indictment. It was God's act, not mine, and God will take care of it, and don't let the American people forget it. He will take care of it and of every officer of this Government, from the Executive down to that Marshal, taking in every man on that jury, and every member of this bench will pay for it, and the American nation will roll in blood if my body goes into the ground and I am hung. The Jews put the despised Galilean in the grave. For the time they triumphed, but at the destruction of Jerusalem, forty years afterward, the Almighty got even with them. I am not afraid of death. I am here as God's man. Kill me to-morrow if you want. I am God's man, and I have been from the start."

Judge Cox then proceeded to pass sentence, addressing the prisoner as follows: "You have been convicted of a crime so terrible in its circumstances, and so far-reaching in its results, that it has drawn upon you the horror of the whole world and the execrations of your countrymen. The excitement produced by such an offense made it no easy task to secure for you a fair and impartial trial, but you have had the power of the United States treasury and of the Government in your service, to protect your person from violence and to procure evidence from all parts of the country. You have had as fair and impartial a jury as ever assembled in a court of justice. You have been defended by counsel with a zeal and devotion that merits the highest encomium, and I certainly have done my best to secure a fair presentation of your defense. Notwithstanding all this you have been found guilty. It would have been a comfort to many people if the verdict of the jury had established the fact that your act was that of an irresponsible man. It would have left the people a satisfying belief that the crime of political assassination was something entirely foreign to the institutions and civilization of our country; but the result has denied them that comfort. The country will accept it as a fact that the crime can be committed, and the court will have to deal with it with the highest penalty known to the criminal code, to serve as an example to others. Your career has been so extraordinary that people might well, at times, have doubted your sanity, but one can not but believe that when the crime was committed you thoroughly understood the nature of the crime and its consequences"—[Guiteau—I was acting as God's man]—"and that you had moral sense and conscience enough to recognize the moral iniquity of such an act."

The Prisoner—That's a matter of opinion.

"Your own testimony shows that you recoiled with horror from the idea. You say that you prayed against it. You say that your conscience warned you against it, but by the wretched sophistry of your own mind you worked yourself up against the protest of your own conscience. What motive could have induced you to this act must be a matter of conjecture. Probably men will think that some fanaticism or morbid desire for self-exaltation was the real inspiration for the act. Your own testimony seems to controvert the theories of your counsel. They have maintained and thought, honestly, I believe, that you were driven against your will by an insane impulse. The testimony showed that you deliberately resolved to do it, and that your deliberate and misguided will was the sole impulse. This may seem insanity to some persons, but the law looks upon it as a willful crime. You will have due opportunity of having any errors I may have committed during the course of trial passed upon by the court in banc; but, meanwhile, it is necessary for me to pronounce the sentence of the law—that you be taken hence to the common jail of the District, from whence you came, and there be kept in confinement, and on Friday, the 30th day of June, 1882, you be taken into the place prepared for your execution, within the walls of said jail, and there, between the hours of 12 and 2 p. m., you be hanged by the neck until you are dead, and may the Lord have mercy on your soul."

During the reading Guiteau stood apparently unmoved and with his gaze riveted upon the Judge, but when the final words were spoken he struck the table violently and shouted: "And may the Lord have mercy on your soul. I'd rather stand where I do than where the jury does, and where your Honor stands. I'm not afraid to die. I stand here as God's man, and God Almighty will curse every man who has had a part in procuring this unrighteous verdict. Nothing but good has come from Garfield's removal, and that will be the verdict of posterity on my inspiration. I don't care a snap for the verdict of this corrupt generation. I would rather a thousand times be in my position than that of those who have hounded me to death. I shall have a glorious flight to glory, but that miserable scoundrel, Corkhill, will have a permanent job down below, where the devil is preparing for him."

After apparently talking himself out the prisoner turned to his brother and, without the slightest trace of excitement, conversed for some minutes before being taken from the court-room.

George Scoville has returned to his home in Chicago. He will not prepare the appeal papers in the case before March. Guards watch the assassin night and day.

Guiteau was vaccinated in the jail on the day that he received his death sentence.

A Small-Pox Letter.

Deputy Warden Russ was opening Guiteau's mail in the jail office, when all of a sudden the officials scattered in every direction. The cause of the excitement was the opening of a letter from Marietta, Ill., which contained the following message:

"Here, I send you some small-pox. It is worse than the sentence of Judge Cox. Rub yourself with the scab, and it will surely stop your gab."

In the center of the sheet was pasted something that looked like a black wafer. Mr. Russ at once scratched a match and burned the sheet of paper. "I don't know," he said, "but people think these letters go right to Guiteau. His letters have to pass through the inspection officers, and if there is any small-pox virus in them it might spread through the whole jail." The prisoner's mail will hereafter be handled very carefully. Mr. Scoville says he has received four such letters, and has asked the Postmaster General to have his letters examined and fumigated. Mr. Scoville, upon the receipt of the first letter, had himself vaccinated. Guiteau, when he heard about Mr. Scoville's letters, was very anxious to be vaccinated, and his wishes were complied with.

Buried in a Coal-Mine.

COALFIELD, VA., Feb. 3.

Shortly after 1 o'clock to-day an explosion occurred in the Grave shaft of the Midlothian coal-pits. A volume of smoke, cinders, wood and bark burst from the shaft, which became choked up and closed. Intense excitement ensued, as it was known that a large number of men were at work in the pit, which is over 1,200 feet in depth, the galleries extending about three thousand feet under ground. The greatest efforts have been made to tap the pit and reach the injured workmen, but without success. People from all quarters are flocking to the scene of explosion. There are various reports as to the number of workmen in the pit. Some say there are thirty-five, others say that the correct number is probably thirty-two. There is now hardly a doubt entertained that the thirty-two men are dead. If any survived the immediate explosion they were suffocated very soon after. A majority of the intombed were married, and many leave large families. Most of these assembled at the mouth of the shaft, and the scene was heartrending in the extreme.

RICHMOND, VA., Feb. 6.

The men imprisoned in the Midlothian mine, at Coalfield, Chesterfield county, are believed to be dead. The means of ventilating the death-trap were destroyed in the explosion, and the pit was on fire for a time, at least. New apparatus of all kinds will have to be built before even the attempt to rescue the imprisoned persons can be made. The disaster leaves behind it twenty-seven widows and 108 orphan children, for whose relief subscriptions have been started in Richmond. One body has been taken out.

Apportionment—The Pending Bill.

Washington dispatches state that indications point very clearly to the rejection of the pending Apportionment bill in the House in the present shape. The Democrats are generally against it, and many Republicans are openly opposing it. Representative Blackburn says that it is an unjust measure, that it ignores the rapidly growing Western States, and gives an increase in the representation to the Eastern States that are declining in population. He says it will be rejected. Page, of California, says it is founded upon injustice, and it will be beaten badly. Blount says it is infamous, and the method of apportionment on which it is based is outrageous. He is satisfied it will be beaten. Pound, of Wisconsin, feels sure the bill will be rejected. Sparks, of Illinois, is opposed to it, and predicts its defeat. It was supposed that as the bill conferred the increase proposed upon the larger States it would get the support of the delegations from these States, but this is not so. Several members from Pennsylvania now do not think the bill ought to pass. One substitute that will be offered for the pending bill will propose to fix the membership of the House at 321, as that would distribute the representation, it is claimed, more equitably among the factions than any other number. Democrats generally favor the smaller number, and it will be proposed from their side to keep the House at its present figure, 293. Some of those who have studied the drift of opinion think 307 will be the number finally adopted.

A Queer Invention.

A detective machine has been invented in France, but it is hardly likely to take the place of the human kind in general use. It is simply a camera, so arranged that when a suspicious person enters a bank or other room, a clerk touches a little button. Presently, a concealed camera is brought into play, the sensitive plate is exposed, and in an instant the man's photograph is taken. Or, again, the head of the house leaves his business and confides it to his clerk. Some of the clerks go to sleep, or smoke cigars, or skylark, or do other things not exactly in keeping with their calling, when there comes in a series of plates, worked by clock-work, and every action of the clerks during a series of hours is recorded. There might be even a pleasing, though compromising use of this mechanical camera. With such an instrument all the handsomest women at a soiree might be photographed without their knowledge, and galleries of beauties be put up at any one's command.

DOINGS OF CONGRESS.

The Senate amended the Sherman Funding bill, on the 3d, by limiting the withdrawals of bank circulation to $3,000,000 per month, and requiring thirty days' notice. The measure was then passed by 36 to 18. A bill was passed to appropriate $300,000 for the erection of a fire-proof hall of records for the War Department. The Secretary of the Interior transmitted the draft of a bill to extend over Indian lands the act for the preservation of timber. In committee of the whole on the Post-office Appropriation bill, it was agreed that $100,000 may be used in establishing the free-delivery system at new points, and that $25,000 per year shall not be paid for carrying mails across the bridge at St. Louis. The Senate was not in session.

The bill to grant lands in Alabama in aid of the Gulf and Chicago Air-Line railway was reported favorably to the Senate on the 6th inst. A bill was passed directing the purchase of the Freedmen's Bank property in Washington. Mr. Garland introduced an act for the erection of public buildings at Hot Springs. The President sent the following nominations to the Senate: Col. Daniel H. Rucker, Assistant Quartermaster General, to be Quartermaster General, vice Gen. Meigs, retired; Maj. Wm. B. Rochester, Paymaster General, vice Gen. Brown, retired. In the House, Mr. Belmont offered a resolution calling upon the President for a transcript of the letters of Jacob R. Shipherd, of New York, and of the replies made by the State Department. A resolution was adopted directing the Secretary of State to investigate the imprisonment in Mexico of three citizens of the United States for breach of civil contract. The bill to create a liquor commission was defeated.

Mr. Garland introduced a bill in the Senate, on the 7th inst., to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Mississippi, Albuquerque and Interocean railway. A petition was presented asking unobstructed navigation of the Missouri in the construction of bridges. The bill to donate bronze cannon for a statue to Garfield was amended to authorize the Secretary of War to pay $700 to the Society of the Army of the Cumberland out of the sales of condemned ordnance. A report was made on the claims for depredations committed by the Utes at the White river massacre. In the House a resolution was adopted calling on the Postmaster General for information concerning the sub-letting of mail contracts. Majority and minority reports were presented on the bill to extend national bank charters. Mr. Ryan reported the Indian Appropriation bill, setting aside $1,920,208, and reducing the number of Agents to sixty. The Apportionment bill was taken up, and six amendments were offered, fixing the number of representatives at 319 to 365. Mr. Prescott asked that the wealth of the various States be taken into consideration, for which sentiment he was sharply rebuked by Mr. Horr.

Mr. Blair, of New Hampshire, proposed in the Senate, on the 8th inst., a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture or sale of liquor after 1900. Mr. McCall offered resolutions directing the Secretary of State to negotiate for a reciprocity treaty with the Central and South American states. Messrs. Vest and Maxey, in a debate on the matter of arrears of pensions, warmly eulogized the present law. Bills were passed to establish ports of delivery at Kansas City and St. Joseph. The President nominated Commodore John C. Febiger to be Rear Admiral, and Capt. John L. Davis to be Commodore. In the House, Mr. Randall gave notice of an amendment to the Tariff Commission bill, making the body consist of two Senators, three Representatives and four experts. Mr. Lacey reported a bill to establish a postal-savings depository. The Sherman Funding bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Ways and Means Committee. After eulogies upon the late Representative O'Connor, of South Carolina, the House adjourned. The House Banking Committee made a favorable report on the bill to extend the charters of national banks. President Arthur sent a special message to both houses transmitting letters from Secretary Kirkwood and the acting Governor of Arizona in regard to lawlessness in that Territory, and urges the amendment of the posse comitatus act to permit the use of troops in assisting the civil authorities.

Mr. Pendleton presented in the Senate, on the 9th inst., a petition from leading citizens of Pittsburgh asking that competitive examinations be held for appointments to offices, and that no removals be made on partisan grounds. A favorable report was made on the bill for the sale of portions of the reservation at Fort Leavenworth. Mr. Saunders introduced a bill for a bridge across the Missouri near Omaha, and Mr. Grover an act for civil government for Southeastern Alaska. Neil Brown, of Tennessee, was nominated for Secretary of the Senate, but was defeated by the vote of Mr. Brown, of Georgia, who voted with the Republicans, much to the surprise and indignation of the Democrats. Eulogies were delivered upon the late Representative O'Connor, of South Carolina, during which Mr. Bayard paid a glowing tribute to the Irish race. In the House, Mr. Hewitt introduced a bill to regulate the meeting of electors and the counting of the votes for President and Vice President. With Mr. Aldrich in the chair, some hours were spent on the Apportionment bill. Mr. McCoid advocated the Seaton plan, which fixes the number of Representatives from each State without regard to fractions. General sentiment seemed to favor provision for 319 members, which will divide the gain equally between the political parties. A bill was introduced to retire M. C. Meigs with the rank of Major General.

Blaine and the State Department.

BLAINE TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. Blaine, in a letter to President Arthur, expresses great surprise at the annulment of the invitations to the congress of nations, saying that the voluntary humiliation of the United States could only be made more complete by requesting the permission of Europe for the gathering. The ex-Secretary begs that the invitations extended by the President be not recalled, as the meeting is a necessity to the commercial interests of the country.

THE PRESIDENT ANNOYED.

A Washington telegram says "the publication of Mr. Blaine's letter to the President in relation to the proposed Peace Congress of American Republics has added fresh fuel to the flame of discussion that was inspired by the original publication of the State Department correspondence. It is understood that the President will answer Mr. Blaine's letter in a special message to Congress, laying the subject matter of the proposed Peace Conference before the two houses, and telling how the project was matured.

Horses 400 Years Ago.

It is curious to find that in 1435 the Queen of Navarre gave carrots to her horses. The ordinary price of horses in England, in the reign of Edward I., was from £1 to £10. When St. Louis returned from his captivity, the Abbot of Cluny presented to the King and Queen each a horse, the value of which Joinville estimated at 300 livres, about £400 of English money. In Henry VIII.'s time horses were shoed with felt; Shakespeare mentioned this in "Lear."

Grand total coal production of the United States for the year ending June 1, 1880		71,067,576

The production of coal in England was in 1855 64,661,401 tons, and in 1877 it was 136,179,968 tons, and in 1880 it was 146,818,122 tons. The English ton is 2,240 pounds. The number of collieries in 1880 was, in England, 3,880, and in the United States 3,264. The production of English coal is in the proportion of 100 tons for every forty-five tons mined in America, which shows the enormous steam-power and iron-smelting in the little island of Great Britain.

The area of the coal fields of the United States is estimated by the Census Bureau as follows:

The Cat.

The cat is frankly, undisguisedly selfish; there is no denying that. It lives for self, and compasses its ends without scruple, patient to wait, skillful to feign and scheme, and utterly pitiless and unrelenting. But should sportsmen be very severe on the creature that evidently enjoys with a gusto keen as their own, the pursuit of the helpless prey which it hunts and toys with, often as much for diversion as hunger? One hopes, for the sake of the sportive birds and heedless mice, which it fascinates with basilisk eyes and captures with cruel paw, that there may be some occult provision of nature to disarm their fate of its terrors.

Perhaps the theory propounded by Dr. Livingstone when he records his feelings while in the lion's clutch—that the sensations of the prey are rather pleasing than otherwise—may be true. We hope so, but it must be confessed that appearances are not in its favor.

In early youth cat nature appears at its best. Once having emerged from the puling, sightless stage of its first nine days, the kitten becomes a winsome and attractive creature. "Cat like" is a reproachful epithet aptly applied to women of the Becky Sharp type; but it is not considered derogatory to the most fascinating girl to be credited with kitten-like ways—for the kitten is the embodiment of playfulness and grace. The cruel instincts of its tribe are not, however, slow to assert themselves, and it is comical to hear the mimic growl of puny thunder with which the tiny creature gloats over its first mouse.

In the pages of fable, Puss has ever figured largely, but rarely after a flattering manner. His guile and subtlety form the salient points in the representations and his character is painted akin to that of Master Reynard, the master of craft. He is depicted as a demure hypocrite, a false hermit, a deceitful counselor, the ensnarer of the unwary, the ally of wizards and witches. Rats in council debate vainly how to baffle him. It is hopeless, they find, to dream of "belling the cat." Noiseless himself on his gloved feet, his keen ear is not to be caught napping.—Temple Bar.

THE old Duke of Wellington carried his punctilliousness and sense of justice into every transaction. He was very desirous of purchasing a farm adjacent to his estate of Strathfieldsaye, and gave his agent orders to negotiate. A few days after he was congratulated by a friend upon having obtained a bargain, as the owner of the farm was in difficulties. "What sort of a bargain?" asked the Iron Duke. "Well, the property was valued at £11,000, but the man was glad to take £8,000." "Is that so?" asked Wellington, turning to his agent, and, receiving an affirmative reply, he said quickly, "Then take the extra £3,000 to the last owner, and never speak to me of cheap land again."

AUBURN COURIER.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1882.

THERE'S nothing selfish about Chicago people. When a baker's family had the small-pox the baker divided his time between nursing the patients and waiting on the public. He was perfectly willing that others should have some of it.

A DOCTOR has been arrested at Louisville for stealing a woman's heart, and committed to prison. This does not seem so strange when it is known that the woman was dead, and that after he had made a post mortem examination he took the heart away with him.

IT is said to be a significant fact that the Irish newspapers contain an average of five advertisements each for young men to collect rent, where they have no advertisements at all from energetic young men anxious to secure those profitable and pleasant situations.

THE Chicago public libraries are having a curious annoyance in the form of an army of tramps who go in ostensibly to read the papers, but in reality to get out of the cold. The police are sometimes called in as often as four or five times a day to clean out the gang of unkempt loafers.

AN autograph letter of George Washington's, taking strong ground against slavery in this country, and expressing a fervent hope that it would soon be blotted out, is said to have been found among the papers of the late E. W. Stoughton. With it were other original and unpublished letters of Washington.

A RICH copper mine has been rediscovered in the vicinity of Tucson, Ari., within a few weeks. Nearly fifteen years ago it was first found, but the men who located the claim were driven from the mountains by hunger, and neglected to take accurate bearings of the spot. Since then four or five prolonged attempts to find the rich deposit have failed.

A STONE bridge to be built at Minneapolis, Minn., bids fair to become one of the notable structures of the world. It will consist of sixteen eighty-feet spans and four 100-feet spans, and, including the shore-pieces, will have a total length of 1,900 feet. It will support two railway tracks at a height of over sixty feet above the water, and will run diagonally across the river below St. Anthony's falls. The cost is estimated at nearly $500,000.

THE foremen of the engine companies of the St. Louis fire department have received instructions to visit all the large buildings in their respective districts and familiarize themselves with the location of the entrances, hallways, inside doors, etc., so that in case of a fire every foreman will know the best way to take a line into that portion of the building in which the stream will do the most good.

THE Denver Tribune says: "In 1860 Judge Sumner, now of Las Vegas, kept the Guy House at the foot of the big hill on the road to the Gregory diggins. He relates his first remembrance of George Pullman, of palace-car fame, in this wise: 'One morning as the coach came dashing down the hill at a breakneck speed, it wheeled up at the door for a change of horses, and a stout, red-faced man jumped from the box and called out: "Gin and sugar for twelve and a bottle of hair-oil for one." This was George Pullman, and the bald-headed man was Joe Chaffee. Henry Villard, the fifty-million man of the Northern Pacific, took soda.'"

SEVERAL American millionaires have during the past few years by their wills violated the spirit of American law and aped that of England. The spirit of republican law divides an estate among children alike, and knows no favorite elder son. That it provokes ill feeling and embitters those nearly related needs no facts to prove. Such attempts to build up a family name by money should meet the public disapproval. Commodore Vanderbilt's was a glaring case. Old John Anderson recently died, leaving an estate of about $5,000,000 to his son John, and an annuity to his daughters of $3,000 per year. Men who are making their wills should not allow their pride in a family name to persuade them to do so plain an act of injustice to their families, and so open a thrust at the unwritten law of the republic.

IN July last, George Sands, a well-to-do farmer living near Milan, Ohio, took home $300, and, handing it to his wife, requested her to take care of it. She, with the thoughtfulness of the average housewife, considered that the straw bed-tick would be about as safe a hiding place as she could find for the wealth. Accordingly she placed the roll of bills among the straw. The money not being needed for any purpose, it was forgotten, until several weeks after the house had been cleaned, when Mr. Sands inquired of his wife if she had that money. The thought came to her at once that she had emptied that straw bed in the orchard, and, of course, the roll of bills had been dumped out too. A visit to the orchard showed that the swine and poultry had been very industrious there, and ten and twenty-dollar bills were found scattered by the winds and torn by the aforesaid farm stock. Careful search brought back about $230, leaving $70 as the price of the carelessness. Mr. Sands does not put his money in straw-ticks any more.

INDIANA NEWS.

THERE were 10,048,675 cigars made in the Indianapolis district last year, an increase of about 1,000,000 over 1880.

A TABLE prepared by the Statistical Bureau shows that 1881 was much healthier for domestic animals in Indiana than 1880.

FRANK CHAMBERS and wife drove four miles to church in Edinburgh, Johnson county, taking their 4-weeks-old baby, and on the way home the child died.

IN an affray at Fort Wayne between gamblers, Jeff Morris crushed the skull of Harry Maxwell. Friends of the latter made an attempt to shoot Morris on his way to the jail.

A MINER in the Maple Valley mines, Daviess county, stepped on a snake of the spreading viper species, and his cries for help awoke the echoes. The serpent, when coiled, measured nearly twenty-four inches in diameter.

THE average yield of leaf tobacco in Indiana for the last three years has been 6,987,049 pounds, and the average home value of the crop, on the basis of prices in 1880, is $5,958,964. Southern Indiana produces nearly the entire crop.

THE widow of David S. Smith, who was employed as engineer in the construction of the new State House at Indianapolis, has sued the contractors for $10,000, alleging their responsibility for an accident whereby her husband lost his life.

JESSE and Rosanna Richmond, living in Johnson county, are supposed to be the oldest married couple in the State. The former was 105 years old the 8th of December last, and the latter was 104 the 10th of last month. They have been married over eighty years.

STATISTICS show that the total cubic feet of sandstone quarried in Indiana in 1881 was 946,047; cubic feet of limestone quarried, 2,743,453; bushels of lime burned, 1,128,250; bushels of cement manufactured, 144,599; tons of coal mined, 2,128,977; tons of fire-clay, 202,838.

A HALF day's time of the Circuit Court at Rockport was taken up in trying a case where the sum of 17 cents was involved. The parties traveled over twenty miles to attend court. The case was decided in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff now has a bill of costs amounting to about $50 to pay.

SOME Crawfordsville College boys had fun in one of the rural precincts, the other night, attending a lecture by one of their own number, who was advertised as the funny man of the Detroit Free Press, and afterward enjoying the sumptuous repast set out by leading citizens of the township in honor of the lecturer.

THE Indiana Supreme Court has rendered a decision affirming the constitutionality of the Sunday-observance law, which was contested on the ground that in the exemption of the Hebrews from its penalties and provisions the law granted privileges and immunities to a distinct class or creed, and was, therefore, obnoxious to the Bill of Rights.

THE Indiana Bureau of Statistics has compiled a comparative statement of the hay crop for the last three years, which shows the total number of tons produced in 1878 to have been 1,189,368; in 1879, 1,001,029; in 1880, 1,217,942; total for three years, 3,408,289 tons. The average value, on the basis of prices in 1880, was $14,769,249 annually.

A VIOLENT wind-storm at Lafayette, the other night, displaced one of the smaller spires on the front of Trinity Church. The ornament, nearly a ton in weight and about twelve feet in height, twisted around on its foundation and fell, leaning up against one of the larger spires, where its peculiar position allowed it to remain until it was taken down before any further damage occurred.

THE Fort Wayne Gazette is responsible for the following: A gentleman in the West End, when the small-pox scare was first agitated in the city, purchased some vaccine matter for the purpose of vaccinating his family. He mixed the matter with some water on a piece of glass, and in doing so a portion of the mixture adhered to one of his finger-nails. Soon after, having occasion to pick his nose, he unfortunately used his finger, which had come in contact with the matter, and the consequence was, it "took" splendidly in his nasal organ. Coming in contact with the membranes in the nose, it spread all through his head, and as a result he has been confined to his bed for two weeks. There will be no question hereafter with this gentleman that if there is any virtue in vaccination he will never have the small-pox.

THE twenty-ninth annual report of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Prof. J. M. Bloss, has been filed with the Governor. The total enumeration of school children for the year in the State was 359,454 white males and 340,290 females, 7,386 colored males and 7,212 females; a total of 714,343 and an increase over the preceding year of 10,785. The common school fund amounts to $9,133,606. The school tuition revenues for the year were $2,962,742, and the total receipts from all sources $5,845,420, and expenditures $1,307,210. The average of school days in the year throughout the State is 135. Four hundred new school houses were built, making a total of 6,640, in which 13,418 teachers are employed. The school property of the State is valued at $12,024,180. Teachers are paid per day as follows, according to the average: In townships, males $1.92 and females $1.62; in towns, males $2.62 and females $1.62; in cities, males $3.67 and females $2.14. The Superintendent reports the school interests of the State in a satisfactory condition, and lays stress on the injunction that the school fund be strictly devoted to the purposes for which it is raised.

WHO ARE PROTECTED AND WHO NOT?

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

The universal assertion by the persons who are demanding more taxation and more tariff and more protection is that every dollar of additional tax that is levied by Congress on consumers has the effect of benefiting the country at large, and especially the "laboring industry" of the United States. This story has been so often and so brazenly asserted in Congress and out of it by demagogues and monopolists, by Senators and Representatives, and by statesmen of high and low degree, that it is possible some of them believe what they say. Just at this time one of these "statesmen" who has courted envious fame by declaring that a tariff should always provide for protection, and only incidentally for revenue, has a bill pending in Congress demanding that the 45 per cent. duty now imposed on steel blooms imported by American manufacturers for making steel rails shall be increased to 180 per cent. This demand is, of course, made with the false pretense that it is for the purpose of benefiting the country, and especially to swell the earnings of the workingmen of the United States. There is no more false representation in this entire nonsense about so-called protection than that it substantially benefits the mass of workingmen, or, even theoretically, but a very small proportion of them. There is, in fact, no portion of the American people which is so sadly victimized by our excessive tariff as the people who work with their hands for a living, and who earn their daily bread literally by the sweat of their brows. To show this we invite our readers to the facts and figures following.

The census of 1880 has not been completed far enough to permit the publication of the tables showing the number of persons employed at labor in the United States and the number employed at each occupation. The census, however, of 1870 contains such a table. The general census shows that the increase of the whole population of the United States for the years between 1870 and 1880 averaged 30 per cent., so in the absence of the exact figures of 1880 we can approximate with reasonable accuracy the number engaged in each class of occupations in 1880 by adding 30 per cent. to the number employed in these several classes in 1870. Thus estimating, we present the number engaged in the several classes of occupations in 1870 as furnished by the census of 1870, and the same numbers increased by 30 per cent. as the probable number in each occupation in 1880, and these figures furnish the following result as to the industrial population at the two dates:

Total, all occupations	12,505,923	16,256,699
Engaged in agriculture	5,922,471	7,699,303
In professional and personal services	2,684,793	3,490,230
In trade and transportation	1,192,238	1,549,909
In manufacture and mining	2,707,421	3,519,647

It will be readily acknowledged and admitted that none of the people engaged in these occupations have any special or direct interest in any tariff for bounty purposes, called protection, except those employed in manufactures, mechanical and mining occupations. All the others, instead of being benefited by protection—i. e., bounty taxes—are oppressed by a remorseless taxation which consumes or confiscates a large proportion of their incomes and earnings by adding at least 50 per cent. to their cost of living.

But an analysis of the list of occupations included under the general head of manufactures, mechanical and mining occupations shows a larger number of persons engaged in occupations which are not protected or benefited by the ultra tariff policy, or, if slightly benefited, are damaged ten times as much as they are helped by the enhanced price of articles caused by the excessive tariff.

Total in 1870	1,750,602
Add 30 per cent	525,180
Total in 1880 non-protected mechanics	2,275,782

In this list we have selected only those occupations which are not protected by any provision in the tariff. There are many others, as, for instance, shoemakers (171,127 in 1870), of whom those in the factories may claim to be in some measure "protected," but the great mass, those engaged in making shoes by hand, in all the cities, towns and villages of the country, instead of being protected are robbed and plundered of their earnings by that ultra tariff. There are many other occupations, such as lumbermen, where the protection, if any, is more sentimental than substantial, and therefore we have left them in the general list of non-protected occupations. Now we have the grand result of the industrial population of the United States in 1870 and in 1880, classified, or divided as between those who are directly or remotely, heavily or faintly, protected by the tariff and those who are unprotected, as follows:

UNPROTECTED CLASSES.

Occupations.	1870.	1880.
Agricultural	5,922,471	7,699,303
Professional or personal	2,684,793	3,490,230
Transportation and trade	1,192,238	1,549,909
Mechanical and mining trades	1,750,602	2,275,782
Totals	11,550,104	15,015,128

	1870.	1880.
Mechanical, manufactures and mining	956,819	1,243,864

The reader will discover from this that, assuming the whole number of persons in the United States engaged in industrial occupations to be 15,015,128, it appears that only 1,243,864 of that number can even claim to be in any way "protected" by the tariff "for protection with incidental revenue." The percentage of the whole people, including every working man, woman and child in the land, shows that the protected class numbers less than 9 per cent. and the unprotected over 91 per cent.

But it should be clearly understood that even to this less than 9 per cent. protection is shameless fraud and mockery. The bulk of the protected classes work in shops and mills propelled by water or steam power, and take care of labor-saving machinery which operates automatically. It is the owners of the steam and water power propelled machines who receive the protection. These labor-saving mills turn out enormous quantities of high-price "protected" goods and wares by the labor and guidance of comparatively few and ill-paid employes. The American people have to pay 40 to 80 per cent. extra price for the goods of automatic-machine production, which is exacted from them under the name of protection to domestic industry.

What Conversion to Republicanism Does.

The purging and cleansing power of conversion to Republicanism is one of the most remarkable things about modern politics. It matters not how low and vile and contemptible an opponent may have been in Republican estimation. It matters not what his political or other heresies have been, or what abuse the Republican party has showered on him therefor. The moment he proclaims his intention—or manifests any indication of a disposition to vote the Republican ticket, he becomes invested with all the virtues in the Republican calendar, while his vices and shortcomings fall away from him and are heard of no more.

There are familiar instances of this along the whole line of Republican dealings with the ex-Confederates. So long as they vote the Democratic ticket they are "unreconstructed rebels," the "vile copperheads," and other terrible things. But let the charms of office beguile them—as they did in the case of Longstreet—into support of the Republican party, and they become at once trustworthy friends of the Union, bulwarks of the constitution—with all the amendments—and staunch supporters of the nation with a big "N."

It has been precisely the same with those who have come into the Republican camp by the Greenback gate. The moment they have fairly landed inside, their denunciation of the banks, which were once regarded as so wicked and communistic, and their belief in the 90-cent dollar, which was once an unpardonable crime, are forgotten and condoned. Solon Chase, of Maine, the great Greenback apostle who drove "them steers" in the last campaign, was reviled and ridiculed by every Republican newspaper and speaker in that State and every other where he lifted up his voice. Now that he is in full communion with the Republican party, the "steers" and the cowhide boots and the other objects, which seemed to that party so absurd and ridiculous, are only alluded to as worthy surroundings of a worthy man or ignored altogether. Similar illustrations might be made from the reception given to Republican converts from the Greenback party in this locality, but for the fact that such converts are, for the most part, only apparent converts. They are men who, being renegades from the Democratic party, merely professed to be Greenbackers in the belief that under that disguise they could aid the great and good Republican party more effectively than by open communion with the latter. Their being found now in such open communion cannot therefore be called a conversion from Greenbackery. It is worth noting, however, that the sins they committed, even when they were Democrats, or professed to be, are no longer laid up against them.—Detroit Free Press.

IN THE reports on American and foreign patents relating to chemistry, published in the Proceedings of the American Chemical Society, we find the following inventions mentioned: A method of making articles from waste amber by treating the pieces with solvents and subjecting them to pressure; a process of obtaining the perfumes of natural flowers by absorption, the flowers being steeped in vaseline which takes up the essential oils and is thus transformed into a perfume; a new fuel consisting of coal-dust ground with lime and formed while moist into masses of convenient size and shape; an illuminating oil made up of petroleum and a small portion of chloroform; and a plastic mass called tripolith, which is a substitute for plaster of Paris and is said to have advantages over that substance, presumably for the use of sculptors.

PROVED A SUCCESS BY YEARS OF USE!

THE PASTILLE
Prof. Harris' Radical Cure
Trade Mark
FOR NERVOUS DEBILITY

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoroughly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by
HARRIS REMEDY CO. MF'G CHEMISTS,
Market and 8th Sts. ST. LOUIS, MO.

Indiana, April 11, '79.—The Remedy is working perfectly. Had epilepsy from weakness, for 8 years past.

Iowa, Oct. 18th, '79.—I am almost surprised at your Pastilles. They have worked like a charm on me. I am just twice as much of a man as I was before taking. I was on the verge of the grave, I thought, and there was no cure for me, but now I am in good hopes for a cure.

West Virginia, Aug. 28, 1879.—I received your medicine and I believe it has cured me, for which I am very thankful. Inclosed find $5. Please send me another box [No. 2] for a friend. You have done a great thing for me. I will send you all the orders I can.

From a Physician and Surgeon.

Missouri, June 2.—Please forward me another box of the Pastilles. The patient on whom I have used most of one box, in addition to a sample box, is fast recovering, and I think another will set him all right.

From a Druggist.

Maryland, Sept. 2, '79.—Last January we got a box of your Remedy for one of our customers, and it has made a perfect cure of him. We have another customer as suffering in the same way, and wish one No. 3 box.

Something Strange—A Study for Physicians.

Hi. Studding, of Edwardsburg, Mich., was bitten by a rattle snake a few years ago. At the time of the occurrence, he received such medical treatment as to apparently effect a permanent eradication of the poison from the system, without much suffering or inconvenience on the part of the patient. Last Friday night, while attending some entertainment Mr. Studding was suddenly seized with a violent trembling in the leg which the rattle-snake had bitten, and continued until he was thrown into a most violent spasm, requiring the combined exertions of several men to hold him comparatively quiet. He was removed to his home, physicians were immediately summoned, and when last heard from, last evening was somewhat improved. Dr. Fisher, of this city, was summond. Monday to examine the case. In the interim from Friday to Saturday he was frequently seized with paroxysms and spasms, all of which were more or less severe than the first. The actions of the patient at such times were wonderful to behold. He would crawl and wriggle upon the floor like a snake, he would dart out his tongue, bite his hands and the pillows of the bed snap at his attendants, &c., embodying in the human form all the actions and characteristics of the serpent. The physicians assert that the sudden attack was caused by the vaccine (Mr. S. having recently been vacciated) arousing to action this poison with which the patient had been inoculated ten years previous and which had been dormant in the system all the time. Whatever be the decision of medical practitioners concerning the case in the future, the develoments so far indicated something reasonable in the assetion of the Edwardsburg physicians. — Elkart Monitor.

Miss Louise Eldredge, who has just returned from a visit near Ionia, relates a very amusing incident that took place on board the cars, while on her way to Adrian. Somewhere along the route a man entered, and, the cars being crowded, he took a seat beside Miss Eldredge and when the conductor came along tendered him a round trip ticket, the limit of which had expired. The conductor refused to receive it on the ground that it was void. The man insisted that it should pass for his fare and that the ticket had never been used. Without further parley the conductor jerked the bell, saying he would put the passenger off, who then tendered the fare in cash; but the railroad official had now got upon his dignity and replied that it was too late. Off he must go. The cars had stopped and the fun began. The conductor seized the passenger and the latter grasped the back of the seat with an arm each side of Miss Eldredge. who was thus firmly if not lovingly, surrounded. The fellow proved more than a match for the conductor who summoned the entire train force, and for several minutes the battle raged furiously, while so vigorous was the resistance that for a time the plucky victim of the assault bid fair to hold the fort in spite of the fearful odds. And all this while the Adrian young lady was encircled with the brawny arms of her fellow-passenger who clung to the seat with a book agent's tenacity. Frightened women and discreet men hurried from the car, and still the struggle went on, with Miss Eldredge firmly imprisoned between the arms of the doughty chap resisting expulsion. The odds prevailed and at length she was released from a not altogether loving embrace, the passenger's grip wrenched loose, and himself hustled from the train. The situation was doubtless exciting, but we venture that Miss Eldredge was not frightened, in which all will agree with us who remember the attempted escape of [illegible] from the Adrian jail when [illegible] Eldredge was sheriff, and of [illegible] bravery in facing the [illegible] with a cocked revolver.—Adrian (Mich.) ONE EXPERIENCE FROM MANY.—I had been sick and miserable so long and had caused my husband so much expense, no one seemed to know what ailed me, that I was completely disheartened and discouraged. In this frame of mind I got a bottle of Hop Bitters and used them unknown to my family. I soon began to improve and gained so fast that my husband and family thought it strange and unnatural, but when I told them what had heped me, they said "Hurrah for Hop Bitters! long may they prosper, for they have made mother well and us happy."—The Mother. 7-2w is the exclamation of more than one poor, hard-working man and woman. Do you know how it aches? It is because your kidneys are over-tasked and need strengthing, and your system needs to be cleansed of bad humors. Kidney-Wort is the medicine you need. "It acts like a charm." says a well known physician, "I never knew it to fail." Liquid or dry sold by Druggists.—Boston Post.

COLOURLESS AND COLD.—A young girl deeply regretted that she was so colourless and cold. Her face was too white, and her hands and feet felt as though the blood did not circulate. After one bottle of Hop Bitters had been taken she was the rosiest and healthiest girl in the town, with a vivacity and cheerfulness of mind gratifying to her friends. 5-2w.

A Nice Bible.

We were shown a new edition of the bible, the other day, that is unquestionably the best ever sold in this part of the country. The type is large and clear, and the illustrations are of the best, great pains having been taken to make them natural and correct. The costumes of the High Priests, the tabernacle with its furniture and covering are all drawn, so as to show not only the shape and make of these articles, but the color as well as the gold and the bronze vessels. There are 2000 fine illustrations, and the book contains 2,000 pages. It has the celebrated Cruden's Concordance complete, a bible dictionary, the Apocrypha, the life of Christ, a history of the bible and of each of its books, the Psalm and an appendix in which is the new translation of the New Testament, so that readers can compare it with the common edition. It has an account of the recent explorations of the Bible Lands with maps and pictures of the leading cities. A new and valuable feature is the showing in the natural colors, of the plants, etc. This splendid work is being sold by J. F. Morr, who will canvass the entire county. Every student of the bible or of bible history, and every Sunday school worker should have a copy of this great family work. 6-2t

Holloway' Pills.

Never dispair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispels doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

A Remedy for Smallpox.

LEMON JUICE TRIED AND FOUND TO BE A SPECIFIC.

The Scientific American publishes some interesting particulars respecting the practice of Dr. A. S. Payne, late professor in Southern Medical College Atlanta, Ga. Dr. Payne says that, as early as 1846, he noticed that the initial smallpox fever could be discovered by its peculiar pulse before any other symptom appeared. Having discovered this pulse, he proceeded to vaccinate. If this is done within ten or twelve hours after the inception of the fever the patient will have a slight indisposition, without a sign of eruption, and as positive exemption from a reoccurrence of the disease after it had passed through its stages. A remarkable feature of this experience is that if the patient is vaccinated early after the initial fever sets in he may be allowed to go where he pleases without fear of spreading the disease. Prof. Payne has tried his plan for thirty-four years on more than 100 cases, without failure He advised the discontinuance of smallpox hospitals, as tending to increase the ravages of the disease, and, instead, recommending isolation of patients, and, where parties are disposed to the smallpox, visit them twice a day, and as soon as the fever is recognized, vaccinate them. He believes this method would soon stamp out the disease, which is now becoming so prevalent.

REMEDY FOR SMALLPOX.

It is as follows: I was taken sick April 14 with what I supposed was a severe cold, having had my hair shingled the previous Friday. The 14th I was quite feverish, with a severe pain in the head and back. Saturday, 16th, I was no better; Sunday somewhat reduced, I presume, by the aid of aconite, which had been administered to me by Dr. Morris and Dunn; eruption very indistinct underneath the skin.

Monday morning, 18th, eruption unmistakably that of small pox. Tuesday morning, eruption very abundant, crop increasing rapidly in size and number. Wednesday morning, a very dense crop all over the face, forehead, scalp and head, neck and soles of feet. Upon the arms, legs and body they were very evenly distributed, but not so closely packed as upon the above mentioned parts. By evening I was suffering intensely from those on the scalp. By 10:30 o'clock the pain was almost intolerable. My nurse had retired and was sound asleep in bed. My feet were so tender that I dared not let them touch the footboard of the bed. My head I could not suffer to lie on the pillow. I lay, raised up on my elbow, my neck resting on my hand. I had by this time become so nervous I dare not shut my eyes from fear of seeing unpleasant visions. Pulse about 90. I had upon the table at the bedside a pitcher of water and a drinking glass, a box of seidlitz powders and an ounce of chlorate of potash in crystals. I also had at my bedside a paper of lemons, also one orange.

These were all the agents within my reach.

I recollected that lemon juice in sufficient quantity was a sedative, and would lower the heart's action, and by so doing might relieve me of those

UNPLEASANT VISIONS.

I therefore squeezed all the juice I possibly could out of one of the lemons into the glass, to which I added about two tablespoonfuls of water, and drank it. I then opened the rind and sucked the balance of the juice. In about twenty minutes I took another lemon and used it in the same manner. In a short time I felt very cold, as if I were lying in close proximity to a large mass of snow or ice. My pulse had dropped to 60. I shut my eyes to see if the unpleasant visions were gone. I not only found that they were gone, but by placing my hand upon my head, I found the pox had gone also. My head was bathed with gummous like fluid, which had exuded from the pox. It stained the napkin I had applied to wipe it off It seemed as if such had given up its contents and wilted down to a level with the surface. The same had taken place with those upon my face. My beard was glued together with the same kind of fluid. Those upon my neck had not bursted, but had shrunk away and diminished in size considerably. I awoke, I presumed, from cold, although I had plenty of cover over me, and the fire was still burning in the grate. I felt so well pleased that I took a little more lemon juice. I kept my pulse at from 60 to 67 for thirty-six hours, when all eruptions, all elevations, had disappeared from my skin. I then bid good-bye to lemon juice and smallpox.

So strongly am I convinced of the power of lemon juice to abate any and every case of smallpox, if administered as I administered it, to myself, that I look upon it as a specific of as much certainty and power in smallpox as quinine is in intermittent fever. I therefore publish my experiments, hoping every physician having a case of smallpox will give it a fair trial and report the result to me.

Cleanliness.

The surface of the human body, and even the delicate membrane covering the eye, as well as the mucous lining of the internal passages of the animal body, may and often become diseased in such a manner, by neglect of purity and careful cleanliness, that they will give off contagious matter. The contagious disorders of the skin, the eyes and the mouth are results of neglect of cleanliness, and are justly esteemed very disgusting. Decaying matters, whether vegetable or animal, and not unfrequently the, still living but unhealthy and unclean surfaces and tissues of both animal and vegetable bodies, are apt to become infected with parasites which prey upon and injure or destroy the tissues. Even the tenderest parts and juices of vegetable substances and the skin, the muscles and blood of the animal, may be harmed in this way. It was a little invisable parasite which destroyed the potatoes at harvest time throughout the country many years ago, and there are some foul waters and infected kinds of meats which will breed diseases in persons who partake of them. Therefore, it is a duty to be cleanly in food and drink, as well as in our breathing and personal habits. It is doubtful if persons who become filthy in their habits and neglect to provide for the purification of their bodies, clothing and premises, will ever be found pure and sweet in their thoughts, language and influence.

Roman Remains in London.

Modern London is built on the debris of the London of the times of Julius Cæsar and Agricola, and it is by no means infrequently that 1800-year old relics of the Roman town are found many feet below the surface of the existing streets. There was a rich find recently in the vicinity of Warwick square at the depth of nineteen feet. The most interesting relic that came to light was hitherto unknwn coin, of the year 50, which lay alongside of about a dozen urns containing the products of cremation. Just think of the pangs which dying would have afflicted on those ancients if they had known that their ashes would have been seen and handled by an unknown race of eighteen centuries and a half, nearly, after their demise! The most aristocratic urn was of glass and fifteen inches high. Well executed leaden pots inclosed several of these depositores, and roofing tiles the rest. The use of lead, as well as tin, by the way, has great antiquity in Britain, Herodotus speaks of the production of tin there. Emblems of more or less significance touching the future state appeared on some of the receptacles. Along with the coin of the year 50 were others of dates between 46 and 300. But the Romans left something besides these useless things to be remembered by. They introduced into Great Britan its chestnut, walnut, peach, pear and cherry trees.

ONE EXPERIENCE FROM MANY.—I had been sick and miserable so long and had caused my husband so much expense, no one seemed to know what ailed me, that I was completely disheartened and discouraged. In this frame of mind I got a bottle of Hop Bitters and used them unknown to my family. I soon began to improve and gained so fast that my husband and family thought it strange and unnatural, but when I told them what had heped me, they said "Hurrah for Hop Bitters! long may they prosper, for they have made mother well and us happy."—The Mother. 7-2w

—Whatever your sex or position, you are liable to coughs, colds and lung complaints. Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup is a sure cure. Price twenty-five and fifty cents a bottle. Ask your druggist.

Saturday at 1.35 p. m. train No. 32 broke in two and ran together one mile west of South Bend. The rear end ran into the leader standing two oil tanks and one flat on ends. One of the oil tanks was also detached. The wrecking car was immediately sent for to clear the road. No. 7 was delayed at South Bend 3 hours and 2 minutes on account of the wreck. There were 52 drawbars broken throughout the wrecked train.—Elkhart Monitor.

Saturday evening about 9 o'clock as Mrs. Virgin and her sister were on their way house the former was robbed of her portmonnie containing about $5. The ladies live in the Fourth ward and as they were passing the Dwight house a burly negro grabbed hold of the book. Looking up and seeing that it was a black man, Mrs. Virgin loosed her hold and ran, leaving the thief in possession of the property and at liberty to run up an adjacent alley and escape with no clew to his identity.—South Bend Register.

While opening up a gravel pit near Bellefontain, O., last week, the workmen unearthed a human skeleton that had evidently been there many years. With it was a fife, parts of it, with the metal mouth-piece, being in a good state of preservation. Near the remains was a large cannon ball. The remains are supposed to be one of Hull's soldiers, a fifer. Hull marched through Logan county during the war of 1812 to Detroit, one of the finest pikes in the county being located on "Hull's Trace."—News.

Wet and Dry Thunderstorms.

A correspondent of the London Times, writing from the Transvaal, says: "Every afternoon tremendous storms of thunder and lightning burst upon us. These were of two kinds, the wet and the dry. The first is harmless, though noisy; the second exceedingly dangerous. During the dry thunderstorms, which were prevalent toward the end of October, the lightning seemed quite stupefyng. It was accompaned by either wind or rain. The angry flashes were followed almost simultaneously by awful crashes of thunder, which seemed to shake the earth. One or two tents were struck, and the grass was set fire to in several places within sight of our camps, but no life was lost, only some arms damaged. The dry thunderstorms were soon followed by wet ones. The rain, mixed up with enormous hailstones, soused the thirsty earth, and every little crack on the veidt bore its burden of water to the Vaal, which rose and became impassable."

"MY TORMENTED BACK."

is the exclamation of more than one poor, hard-working man and woman. Do you know how it aches? It is because your kidneys are over-tasked and need strengthing, and your system needs to be cleansed of bad humors. Kidney-Wort is the medicine you need. "It acts like a charm." says a well known physician, "I never knew it to fail." Liquid or dry sold by Druggists.—Boston Post.

WILD WEATHER OUTSIDE.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Wild weather outside where the brave ships go,
And fierce from all quarters the four winds blow—
Wild weather and cold, and the great waves swell,
With chasms beneath them as black as hell.
The waters frolic in Titan-play,
They dash the decks with an icy spray,
The great sails shiver, the lithe masts reel,
And the sheeted ropes are as smooth as steel.
And oh that the sailor were safe once more
Where the sweet wife smiles in the cottage door!

The little cottage, it shines afar
O'er the lurid seas, like the polar-star.
The mariner tossed in the jaws of death
Hurls at the storm a defiant breath;
Shouts to his mates through the writhing foam,
"Courage! please God, we shall yet reach home!"
Frozen and haggard and wan and grey,
But resolute still: 'tis the sailor's way.
And perhaps—at the fancy the stern eyes dim—
Somebody's praying to-night for him.

Ah me, through the drench of the bitter rain,
How bright the picture that rises plain!
His little maid crooning her spelling-book;
The baby crows from the cradle fair;
The grandam nods in her easy-chair;
While hither and yon, with a quiet grace,
A woman flits with an earnest face.
The kitten purrs, and the kettle sings,
And a nameless comfort the picture brings.

Rough weather outside, but the winds of balm
Forever float o'er that isle of calm.
Oh, friends who read over tea and toast
Of the wild nights' work on the storm-swept coast,
Think, when the vessels are overdue,
Of the perilous voyage, the baffled crew,
Of stout hearts battling for love and home
'Mid the cruel blasts and the curdling foam,
And breathe a prayer from your happy lips
For those who must go "to the sea in ships;"
Ask that the sailor may stand once more
Where the sweet wife smiles in the cottage door.

THE LOST PACKET.

It was drawing toward Christmas time, and Harry Wentworth was very busy—busy in behalf of his employers, and busy in his own behalf—for it had been arranged that on Christmas day he and Emma Dwight should be made man and wife.

Harry Wentworth was a young man of three-and-twenty—active, enterprising and possessed of intelligence far above the average; and not least of his good qualities was the unswerving, untiring and heartfelt zeal and faith with which he had appeared to serve his employers; for he was employed as head bookkeeper and confidential clerk of a heavy importing house in the city. He was the only child of a widow, who had looked to him for love and care since he had been old enough and strong enough to earn the wherewith for her support.

Emma Dwight was the daughter of a Judge of the Supreme Court of the commonwealth—a true-hearted, bright-faced, graceful girl, loving her Harry with all her strength of heart and soul. She was her mother's child in quality of spirit and general disposition—mild, unassuming, gentle and charitable. The father was of sterner stuff—an upright, religious man, but not so apt to smile as were his wife and daughter.

It was near the Christmas time, and in the house where Harry was engaged the hands were very busy. Country traders were buying for the holidays, and a large share of the custom of those who dealt in the class of goods carried by the concern came to that place. One day the regular messenger had been sent upon an important mission to the Custom House, and, as it drew near the time for the bank to close, Harry bethought him that if he did not make haste in some other way, he would miss the opportunity of reaching the paying-teller of the bank. He had upon his desk, or in his possession, the company's check for $30,000, and this check was to be cashed in bank notes for the use of another firm, the senior partner of which was the brother of the senior of Harry's firm. This other firm was engaged in the wool business, and the money was for the use of purchasing agents who were to go through three or four States of the Union.

The messenger had taken the bank-book and cash for deposit on his way to the Custom House, so that Harry had only the check to attend to. Having looked at the clock, and seen the brief space of time that was his, and having looked toward the street door and seen that no messenger was coming, he prepared to go upon the errand himself. He had on an old office coat, worn and ink stained, but he would not stop to exchange it. The capacious overcoat would cover such imperfection, and, having donned the latter garment, he hurried away.

It was past 2 o'clock when Harry reached the bank. The wicket of the receiving teller was closed and the paying teller was just in the act of closing his; but when he saw the newcomer, heated and puffing with exertion, he slid it open again and asked what he wanted. Harry stated the circumstances and produced the check. The teller turned to the bookkeeper, at his private desk, and, having found he could enter the new item without trouble, he turned again to the customer and, with a bland smile, informed him that he could have the money. Said he:

"We don't make a practice of doing this thing, but I don't think the officers would care to disappoint such customers as are your folks when it could be avoided."

Then he smoothed out the check before him, and counted out the money in such denominations of notes as the applicant had suggested would be convenient—fives, tens, twenties and fifties, mostly—there were ten $100 notes, ten $500 and two notes of $1,000 each. Harry ran it over after him, and then asked for an envelope in which to put it. The teller gave him an envelope of strong manila paper, such as the bank used for that same purpose. The notes—a goodly packet—were put carefully in, and the envelope sealed, after which Harry returned to his store.

Once more at his post, Harry Wentworth put away his overcoat, and then went to his desk, and put his hand into his pocket for the precious envelope—into the inner breast-pocket of his coat on the left side. The pocket was empty! He felt in other pockets—ran to his overcoat, and went through the pockets of that—but—the packet of bank-notes was gone!

Oh! he had forgotten his old office-coat—had not once thought that the old working-sack was upon him, with its breast-pocket torn more than half-way! Aye—the pocket—or the hole—into which he had put his sealed packet was not only minus a bottom seam, but fully one-half of the lower part of the pocket was torn away!

Once more Harry sprung into his overcoat, and away over the route by which he had come from the bank—his eyes fixed upon the sidewalk, and in the gutter—every possible space, nook, corner and gully, looked upon—but no packet such as he had lost. Up the stairs of the bank—the banking-rooms were on the second floor—he went slowly, peering into every corner—and thus he reached the bank counter empty-handed. The people of the bank were just coming out of the Directors' room, where they had been making up the accounts of the day, when Harry entered. He saw the paying-teller and told him of his loss.

"In mercy's name! Can you give me comfort?"

The teller was at first like a man thunderstruck; then he shook his head sorrowfully. He could give no comfort. And if he could not, of course, none of the others could; for he had been the last one in the banking-house.

With a heart heavy and sad—a heart sunken into an agony such as he had never before even dreamed of—Harry returned to his store, looking again on the way, and inquiring of men whose faces encouraged him—but his looking and his inquiries were in vain. At the store he went into the private office of the senior, and to that individual told the story of his mishap. The first effect upon the merchant, who was a man of quick and tender sympathies, was made by the outbursting grief and agony of his favorite clerk; and when he had heard the whole story, and had been shown the tattered fragments of a pocket, he said cheerily:

"Well, well, my boy, don't be broken-hearted. We'll make a general movement for the missing packet at once, and I guess we'll find it. Do you go directly to the Chief of Police, and set him at work first. I will see the printer. Ah! I have great faith in printer's ink, Harry. It is one of the seven mighty powers of the age in which we live."

And so the search commenced; and it was continued until Christmas day, without effect. Not a clew—not a sign—not a thing of any description had been discovered. It was as though the money never had been, or else—

Ah! poor Harry Wentworth was to know, sure enough, what else people thought might have been! He discovered the cloud first at the home of his beloved. He found her, on the evening of the second day before Christmas, with red and swollen eyes, and sobbing as though her heart would break. In terror he asked her what had happened.

"Oh, Harry! Harry! Ask papa! Ask papa! I cannot speak!"

The youth was thunderstruck. The truth burst upon him in that moment for the first time. The thought that it could ever enter into the mind of one who had been his true friend that he—Harry Wentworth—could do so wicked a thing had never come to him, even by so much as a shadow. He did not see Judge Dwight on that evening.

On the following morning—the morning of the day before Christmas—when Harry entered the counting-room, his senior employer called him into the private office, and pointed him to a seat. The old man's face was not hard, but sad and stern, as though he had put on the sternness for the occasion.

"Harry, I want you to tell me the truth—the simple, straightforward truth—and nothing else. Have you, within the last two or three months, purchased and paid for a house in the upper part of the city?"

The young man started and gasped for breath. The accusation was plainly made in those words! He had bought the house and paid for it. In a moment he had turned pale as death, and for that single moment every atom of strength seemed to forsake him.

"Harry Wentworth!" pursued the merchant, with a terrible look, "where did you get the $7,000 you paid, in cash, for that house?"

Poor Harry! He must tell the only thing he had ever done of which he could feel in any degree ashamed—must tell of the only dollar he had ever gained which he had not legitimately earned.

During the summer last passed he had been induced by a friend, who was just ready to start for Cuba, to invest $10 for a package of tickets in one of the Havana lotteries. He had bought the ticket, and had drawn a prize of $6,000. The other $1,000—and considerably more that—he had saved from his salary. He had never spoken of the lottery tickets, nor the prize, because he had felt that the operation was not such as he would wish to recommend. Still he had tried to flatter himself that a great portion of the wealth of the day was gained in a way no better—that the thousand-and-one bargains of almost every day, on the street, and at the brokers' board, were of the same character. He had told himself this, and had used the money.

And this story he told to his employer—the story of the lottery-ticket, the prize, and of the travail of his spirit.

"Where is the man who bought the tickets for you?"

Harry thought he had gone from Havana to Brazil.

"He sent to me by mail, sir, and wrote that he should go to South America before returning home."

"Ah!" said the old man, sadly and solemnly shaking his head, "I should not blame you for having bought a lottery ticket. I am sorry to say that much of the business of the day is done upon a basis no better. Only yesterday I purchased six tickets in six different lotteries to be drawn by religious and benevolent societies to-morrow evening. It is not that, Harry. I wish you could prove to me that it had been no worse."

"Mr. Lempierre, do you mean to tell me—that—that you believe I could have kept for myself that packet of money which I said I had lost?"

The merchant was certainly staggered by the youth's look, and by the heart-sent, fervent, honest speech. But the cloud returned upon his face, and, with another shake of the head, he said:

"Harry, I am not alone. The people at the bank declare it must have been so. Look at it for yourself. Think of the time of day—"

"Ah," cried Harry, breaking in upon him, "think of that thing—the time of day! Just the time when business men were almost entirely alone on the street, and when they were hurrying homeward, or office-ward, as swiftly as possible—their banking business done, and their thoughts given to dinner and luncheon. None were going to the banks, but all were going the other way; and how many of them were messengers long used to feasting their eyes upon wealth which they could not possess, but which they would possess if the opportunity should ever offer. Think of it, sir, and say if there might not have been many ways in which that packet could have been picked up and kept. And think of another thing: The very character of the packet—the way in which it was made up—so large a sum, in notes of such small denominations—would convince any person, at all versed in bank affairs, that the numbers of those notes had not been registered; so the money might be used at any time, and in any place, without fear of detection. Why, sir—one-half of that money might have been deposited in that same bank on the very next day, and the receiving-teller could not have sworn that a note of it had been paid out on your check."

Still the merchant was not convinced. A story of excuse was very easy to frame, he said; and no reliance could be placed upon unsupported testimony of that description.

On the evening of that day Harry saw Judge Dwight, and that man sternly forbade the youth to visit his daughter more. He could not listen—he had seen and heard too much of excuse and special pleading by guilty parties to be influenced by anything which did not clearly disprove the thing alleged. No, no—he would not listen. He was stern and harsh, and Harry Wentworth must consider the door of his house as closed to him thenceforth.

But Harry met Emma in the hall as he went out. She fell upon his bosom, and wept and moaned piteously. Her faith in her lover was not shaken; and when he had told her that he would not rest until the cloud had been lifted from his name and fame she told him she would wait for the time.

"Oh, Harry! take my love with you, and let my faith in your goodness give you strength!"

"I shall, darling! I know the truth will appear by-and-by. I feel it, deep down in my heart of hearts, that the cloud shall not always rest upon me. Pray for me, dear one! and I will both pray and work!"

Then Harry Wentworth went home to the one being on earth who knew him innocent and good—his mother!—and there he found rest!

Christmas day dawned—the day which had been set for his wedding! His new house, bought and paid for, he could not move into, and he let a friend have it for a season at a nominal rent. He did not wait to be discharged from the employment of those whom he had served so long; he went to the store on the morning after Christmas, and, calling the three partners into the office, he told them he would take himself out of their way.

"I do not think," he said, "that you intend to prosecute me, because, first—you are not assured in your own minds that I did the dreadful wrong of which I have been suspected; and, second, the crime would be difficult to prove against me. But, sirs, know that I will not rest until this thing is made clear; for I am firm in the faith that I am not to go to my grave with the stain upon me."

It is doubtful if they would have turned him away of their own accord; and yet his presence would have been a source of annoyance, from the fact that the second member of the firm absolutely believed in his guilt, and would have pushed him to the law had not the other two objected.

A remark made by Mr. Lempierre dwelt upon Harry's mind: "The power of printer's ink," and he did not fail to make use of it. He drew up a statement of his case, giving all the particulars—the date, the streets through which he passed, to and from the bank, on that day of misfortune, and, in short, every point that could tell—and at the end he begged that publishers who could feel for him, and who would help a suffering fellow-creature—helping the right at the same time—should copy. Even English or French papers might help him, if they would. This he carried to the publisher of his own favorite daily, and the man took the article as a favor, and would listen to no mention of payment.

The article was printed, and very soon Harry knew that it had been extensively copied. At the end of a month or a little more, Harry met one of the reporters of his daily paper, who informed him that at least two London dailies, and one of Liverpool, had copied his article.

The winter passed—a cold, cheerless winter without, and, to Harry Wentworth, cold and very near to cheerless within! It was very hard thus to live. He could not fail to see that the finger of suspicion was pointed at him, and more than once he heard, as he passed certain people who had once been proud to be classed among his friends, such words as these: "Poor fellow! I pity him, anyhow!" or "Ah! see. It wears on him, don't it? Well, I don't wonder!" And once he heard: "Bah! if I was in his place, I'd either clear out and make my money do me some good, or else I'd own up."

During these dark months he did not see Emma once; but he had a precious line from her that gave him courage and strength. She was as true as refined gold.

The spring opened and one day in early May Harry met Loren Barnett, the paying-teller of the M—— Bank—met him on the street—looking pale, thin and wretched. He had at first seemed inclined to avoid the youth, but, when he found he could not, he met him with seeming frankness and pleasure.

"You are looking poorly, Mr. Barnett. Have you been sick?"

So spoke Harry, after the opening salutations and a few casual remarks.

"I've had a bad turn," answered the teller, languidly. "In fact, I've got a sort of run down. The confinement of the bank is too much for me. I think of going into the country—on to a farm—in the course of a few months. Come up this summer and I'll give you some trouting. There are splendid streams in the neighborhood of my farm."

"Oh—you own a farm?"

"Yes—I've owned one for some time." And with this he turned away.

Two things surprised Harry: First—That any man holding the office of paying-teller should talk of the confinement of the business. And second—that a man possessing such health and vigor as Loren Barnett had possessed six months before could have become so reduced by any amount of legitimate labor. And these thoughts were not quick to leave the mind that had conceived them.

It was on Monday that Harry met Barnett on the street. On the following Wednesday he received a note from Mr. Lempierre, the chief sentence of which was, "Be at my private room at 9 o'clock to-morrow morning. Fail not!"

And Harry went. On entering the little private sanctum he found there the three members of the firm, and with them a man whom he at first took for an utter stranger, but whose countenance became familiar when he had been introduced as Mr. George Sefton, of London, England; and our hero then remembered of having met him and spoken with him, at a large city carpet store, a year or so previously. He was the son of a heavy carpet manufacturer of England, and acting as American agent.

"Come, come," cried Lempierre, as soon as Harry had taken the only spare seat at hand; "we have no time to waste. Harry, my boy, your printer's ink has served you, after all. But I won't anticipate. Let Sefton tell his story. We have heard it, Hal, so he may tell it to you as he pleases."

"It is very simple," said the young Englishman, turning to Harry. "Some time in February last—toward the last of the month—I took up a copy of a daily newspaper, and found therein the article which you had written, and caused to be printed; and you may imagine my feelings when the fact came home to me that I, very likely, was the one man in the world—and the only one—for whose eye it had been written. Ah! you start. Let me tell you—it is very simple, and can be told in a few words.

"On the 20th day of last December, in the afternoon, I was on my way, on foot, to the steamer in which I was to take passage for England. I had only an hour of my own, and you can imagine that time for me to waste was not then. I was walking rapidly, with my coat collar turned up and my hat pulled down, because a strong east wind set up the street and struck me in the face. Still, I kept my eyes open before me, and by-and-by I saw you come out upon the sidewalk from the M—— Bank, and as I looked I thought I saw something drop at your feet—something of a bright yellow color, and glistening in the light. You turned down a street to the left—your own left—before I met you; and when I had reached the spot where I had seen the object fall I found an envelope of bright manila paper, evidently filled with bank notes, and upon the face of the envelope was the imprint of the bank. Had my time been my own I should have followed you, but as I had none to spare I ran up into the bank and found the paying teller alone at his desk and alone in the room! I showed him the envelope and asked him if he recognized it. 'Certainly,' he said. 'I gave it not five minutes ago to Mr. Wentworth for Lempierre and Company.'

"Then I told the teller how I had seen you drop it, and how my need to reach the steamer had prevented me from following you. Ah! I can remember how eagerly—how heartlessly—he asked me if I was going to Europe! and then how earnestly he protested his gratitude to me in your behalf; and how he offered to give me any sum which I might be pleased to claim for my trouble, feeling warranted in the assurance that either you or your employers would cheerfully make it up. But you can imagine how I treated that. I only got the man's name—Loren Barnett—and then, having been assured that the packet should be faithfully delivered, I went my way.

"And that was the last until I saw your appeal in the paper. You can imagine my surprise. I saw it all in an instant. The temptation had been too strong for the teller's honesty. He had said to himself: 'That man is going to Europe. That may be the last of him in this country. Here are $30,000—to me a fortune! Ah, how easily I can hold on to it!' So he thought, and so he did; and—so he might have done to the end, but for your appeal in the paper. I have not put myself out at all in anything I have done. I was arranging for another visit to the United States when I saw the article, and the most I did was to expedite matters a little. And now, gentlemen, you have the matter in your own hands. Call upon me as you may feel to need my assistance."

Mr. Lempierre looked at his watch. It was just half-past 9. The bank would open at 10 for business; and if they should go thither at once they would be likely to find the working force at their posts.

Only three went to the bank—Mr. Lempierre, Mr. Sefton and Harry Wentworth. Arrived at the outer door of the institution they knocked at the door of the private room of the cashier, whom they found in. Mr. Lempierre was at once welcome, as were any whom he might bring in; so the three entered and were seated.

"Is Mr. Barnett in?" asked the merchant.

The cashier, with a swift glance at Harry and another at the stranger, seemed to comprehend. A tremor shook his frame, and his breath came with evident labor.

"Yes," he said, in a whisper. "And this is his last day with us. He is instructing his successor."

"Will you call him in?"

The cashier arose and opened the door communicating with the bank room and called Mr. Barnett's name, and added, "Will you step this way?"

Barnett came quickly. He had entered the room before looking to see whom he was to meet. He saw the old merchant and then saw Harry Wentworth, and then he saw another face. There was a moment's hesitation—a start—a flash—a light upon his countenance as the recognition came to him, and then, with a gasping groan, he tottered back against the wall and stared upon the Englishman with deadly terror and affright.

"Oh, Loren Barnett," spoke Mr. Lempierre, "what have you done? I would not have believed it possible. The taking of the money was nothing compared to the deadly sin of the murder! Ay, the murder of a young and hopeful reputation! Loren Barnett, what reparation can you make?"

Let us not attempt to picture the scene. It was dreadful. The wretch went down upon his knees and begged for mercy. The money he had withheld—stolen—ay, ten thousand times worse than stolen—had been a curse to him, and only a curse. From the moment that he had put that packet away next to his bosom, resolved to keep it as his own, and allow another to suffer for the crime—from that moment he had known no such thing as peace—had known no joy, no gladness—and not a natural smile had appeared upon his waning, fading face! Those who saw and understood would not punish him more. He had not spent the money—or he was able to make up the amount, and when that had been done he was suffered to depart to his far-away country home, there to drag out a weary existence, burdened by the memory of one deed that was sufficient to make dark and cheerless his pathway to the silent shore.

Need we tell of the result to Harry Wentworth? Need we tell how the old friends came flocking back, and how they all declared they had never believed him guilty?

But what cared he so long as the stern Judge, of his own free will, sought him out, and, with warm and generous impulse of love and good-will, asked his forgiveness, and led him like a son of his choice back to the side of his once smiling and happy daughter?

Fighting Trifles—Three Short Stories.

What a world of trouble, time, and nerve irritation would be saved if boys, and men too, would never mind trifling annoyances. Only the other day we overheard one boy telling another what a third boy had said about him, and urging him to "lick him." "Oh," said the second boy, "'tisn't worth minding. He knows it ain't so, and I won't stoop to his level by taking any notice of it." We inwardly thought, "that's a very wise head on young shoulders."

It reminded us of two men, one of whom started on a foot journey of 150 miles or so. Two days later the other man started on the same road, and on the fourth day overtook the first one. The latter remarked:

"This is the worst and slowest road I ever traveled. There is the greatest lot of snarling, barking little dogs I ever saw, and it has taken half my time to drive them off."

"Why," said the second man, "I didn't pay any attention to them, but came right along as if they weren't there." Half the time of many boys and men is wasted in fighting trifles.

A veteran Circuit Judge was always sure of meeting some cutting or sneering remarks from a self-conceited lawyer when he came to a certain town in his rounds. This was repeated one day at dinner, when a gentleman present said: "Judge, why don't you squelch that fellow?"

The Judge dropped his knife and fork, and placing his chin upon his hands, and his elbows upon the table, remarked:

"Up in our town a widow woman has a yallur dog that, whenever the moon shines, goes out upon the stoop and barks, and barks away at it all night." Stopping short, he quietly resumed eating. After waiting some time, it was asked: "Well, Judge, what of the dog and the moon?" "Oh, the moon kept right on," he said.—American Agriculturist.

A BOY'S LUCK.

The Norristown (Pa.) Herald in a recent issue referred, among others, to the following cases of special interest. They are their own commentary. Mr. Samuel C. Nyce resides at 308 Marshall street, and holds the responsible position of journal clerk in the Pennsylvania Legislature, at Harrisburg. While Mr. Nyce and family were in the country recently, his boy, aged 3 years, fell and broke his leg. He recovered, but a very troublesome stiffness set in and he could scarcely use the leg. The injured limb was rubbed several times with St. Jacobs Oil, and the stiffness was so much reduced that the boy was able to use his leg freely. Dr. Knipe said it was the use of St. Jacobs Oil that cured the stiffness. Mr. Nyce himself used the Great German Remedy for toothache with good effect, and also for sprains and pains of rheumatic nature, and always with good effect. Mrs. Nyce also says she thinks the Oil is a splendid thing, and she always keeps it on hand.

The Reason Snakes are Long.

"Do you see that fellow up there?" said Mr. Rivers, pointing to a huge red snake, some ten feet long and two inches thick, of the kind known as the gopher snake. "I'd rather have that fellow on my farm—if I had a farm—than ten dollars. You would be astonished at the amount of vermin, of all kinds, they can get away with—gophers, rabbits, squirrels, birds—anything in fact, that he is big enough to get himself outside of, and that means a good deal, although you might not think it to look at him. You are aware, I suppose, of the peculiar construction of the lower jaw. It can be unhinged, so to speak, and then the snake is nothing more than a long sack with the mouth open. I have watched one of them stow away a squirrel—long tail and all—without making any bones about it. He commenced at the head and slowly drew the squirrel in bit by bit, his teeth and jaws working on the animal somewhat as a man draws in a rope hand over hand. Finally the body was safely housed and then only the tail remained; that slipped down in the twinkling of an eye. I never realized till then why snakes were made so long—it is to make room for the inconvenient tails of other animals predestined to be snake meat. In an improved state of existence, when the tails have been evolutionized off the backs of the other animals, probably snakes will be cut shorter."

Its Equal Is Unknown.

A Lowell (Mass.) paper, so we observe, cites the case of Mr. P. H. Short, proprietor of the Belmont Hotel, that city, who suffered with rheumatism for seventeen years without finding relief from any of the numerous remedies employed until he applied St. Jacobs Oil. "I never found any medicine that produced such remarkable and instantaneous effect as it did," says Mr. Short.—Lyons (Iowa) Mirror.

I AM fully convinced that the soul is indestructible, and its activity will continue through eternity. It is like the sun which, to our eyes, seems to set in night; but it has in reality only gone to diffuse its light elsewhere.

ALWAYS KEEP COOL.

To stick to your subject and the truth is an excellent plan, and whether it be in questions of finance or fishing, or any topic whatever, social or political, always keep cool and tell the truth. However, there is a certain margin allowed for lying when it comes to fishing, that is permitted in no other subject, and no doubt our friends in the picture are indulging in that special employment, as well, perhaps, as in a little scientific swearing. Their bodies and tempers are hot and the air is cool (as they should be, but are not,) and they are apparently in the condition when it is much easier to catch rheumatism than fish, in which case it would be well for them that they be provided with a bottle of ST. JACOBS OIL, the Great German Remedy for this as well as other painful ailments.

WE'LL NAIL ITS COLORS TO THE MAST.

"Hello, Denny! what is the trouble?" "Oh, I'm all broke up," was the response to the inquiry of an old shipmate of William G. Denniston, one of Farragut's war-worn veterans, well known in the southern section of this city, who came limping into the American office yesterday. "I thought I would go under the hatches this time," continued Denniston. "I never suffered so much in my life. I had the rheumatic gout so bad that I could not get off the bed or put my foot to the floor, and would have been there yet if a friend had not recommended ST. JACOBS OIL to me. I hesitated some time before getting a bottle, thinking it was another one of those advertised nostrums, but was finally induced to give it a trial, and a lucky day it was for me. Why, bless my stars! after bathing the limb thoroughly with the Oil I felt relief, and my faith was pinned to ST. JACOB and his Oil after that. I freely say that if it had not been for ST. JACOBS OIL I should, in all probability, be still housed. My foot pains me but little, and the swelling has entirely passed away. It beats anything of the kind I have ever heard of, and any person who doubts it send them to me at 1236 South Tenth st.—Philadelphia Times.

The onion dye is said to fix itself readily, even upon leathers which resist colors, and colors them well and evenly.

THE horse is capable of exerting a stress of only sixty-seven per cent. of his own weight in his daily work. The ox about seventy; the mule seventy-five; the ass eighty; the goat can draw more than his own weight; the lion has been known to drag a slain ox a considerable distance. A fox gallops away with the largest goose at a rapid pace. Monkeys are wonderfully strong for their size. A turtle has been known to move with a man standing on his back six times its weight.

Another Literary Curiosity.

There is just now going the round of the American press "a literary curiosity," consisting merely of Gray's well-known line—

"Homeward the plowman plods his weary way."

The clauses in this sentence are shifted around thus:

The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
His weary way homeward the plowman plods, etc., to the number of twenty-six lines, and this is thought to be sufficiently extraordinary to be widely circulated. As a matter of fact such transpositions are easy. Let the reader try it with almost any familiar line. We take, at random, the first line of Byron's "Waterloo," giving only such changes as will preserve both the sense and the meter:

There was a sound of revelry by night,
Of revelry there was a sound by night,
By night there was a sound of revelry,
A sound there was of revelry by night,
A sound was there of revelry by night,
There was a sound by night of revelry,
Of revelry there was by night a sound,
A sound there was by night of revelry,
By night there was of revelry a sound,
Of revelry was there a sound by night,
There was by night a sound of revelry,
Of revelry a sound there was by night,
A sound of revelry there was by night,
By night a sound there was of revelry,
Of revelry was there a sound by night,
There was by night of revelry a sound,
Of revelry a sound by night there was,
A sound of revelry by night there was,
By night a sound of revelry there was,
Of revelry a sound was there by night,
There was of revelry a sound by night,
By night of revelry there was a sound,
Of revelry by night a sound there was,
A sound by night there was of revelry,
Of revelry by night was there a sound,
A sound of revelry was there by night,
There was of revelry by night a sound,
A sound by night was there of revelry,
Of revelry by night there was a sound,
By night was there a sound of revelry,
A sound by night of revelry there was,
By night was there of revelry a sound,
A sound was there by night of revelry,
By night of revelry a sound there was.

Here we have thirty-four transpositions, eight more than the other. It is not difficult, either; anybody can do it, and some lines would no doubt yield far more.

Queer Ideas of Curative Oils.

Some people still hold to curious old superstitions concerning the curative properties of the oils of certain animals; and to hear the druggists tell of the strange articles called for by some of their customers is to be reminded of the vagaries indulged in by the aboriginal medicine man in his native wigwam. For instance, there are persons who pin great faith still to the virtues of rattlesnake oil, and who believe it is a specific for rheumatic afflictions. A traveling quack, who announced that his cure-all was partly compounded of rattlesnake, reaped a big harvest of silver coin from crowds on the square not long ago. There is a frequent demand for pickerel oil, which is said to be a cure for deafness, and which is fried from the livers of pickerel. Mudturtle oil is also frequently called for by people who have stiff joints. It has been but two or three years since all these oils were staple articles in drug stores. Pickerel oil sold for 50 cents an ounce, and turtle oil $1 a pint. These oils are rarely found to-day, and probably from this very reason are accredited the more wonderful qualities by the oracles.—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

The Woman Market at Tunis.

A most impressive journey is to the palace of the Bey, the Bardo. Passing through the Marine Gate we enter the quarters of the town which lie between the ancient walls and the outer ramparts; we glide past a confused multitude of huts and houses and shops (which are a joke) filled with charming rubbish kept by wax-work figures; rows of sable women sitting against white-washed walls with piles of bread; youths with savage faces; bent old men leaning on their staffs; mangy children with scald heads—shirted, hooded, naked, with features black and yellow in all indefinable shades, in costume for the most part white, squatted in circles, asleep in corners, motionless as the rubbish-heaps which form the background, without a smile, without one movement of muscle, oppressed, weary, petrified, filling the bright air with mystery. We ride on amid a scene peaceful, silent, sad. In these wretched little imps and those horrible hags we see the children of lust and debris of the seraglio. Year by year the negro villages of Soudan are ransacked for girls of voluptuous beauty—who are stolen, or bought for a few beads or a bottle of rum—for the Mussulman market, where, unmoved by pity, swollen with savage passion, the drover knows eager buyers await his arrival. Beautiful women are the money monopoly, the luxury of the fat, fair-complexioned, majestic, lounging, lazy Moor. Over exceptional beauty caids, pashas, ministers and merchants wage a fierce money strife before it is determined in whose embraces it shall be used up. Thousands of both male and female children, from eight to ten years of age, are annually imported into Moorish markets. On their way many of them die of broken hearts. They are fattened prior to sale, and are treated to music to cure homesickness, it is said, and to give the look of contentment, for the Moor loves only the flesh. When worn with care or sorrow, or old age (which comes at thirty) a woman is worthless. Maybe that ghastly wretch, with toothless skull, now more like a fiend's than a woman's face, once smiled in a merchant's face, or wore the pretty necklace of a pasha; with used-up pipes and slippers, she has been cleared out to make room for new ones. The Moor is a hideous hot-bed of sensuality. He believes in the bottom of his heart that in his relations to women he was created to be first a beast, then a brute. Under the curse of such a character his land is a waste, his manhood a ruin. What the European owes to the now attained creed about woman, a glimpse at the empire of the Moor may help us to con-

The Long-Lost Brother.

"Do you vhants an ofercoat made in Baris for only four dollars?" queried the latter as he hurried forward.

"'Tis he!" muttered James as he steadied himself by hanging to the counter.

"Maybe you like to examine some undershirts for twenty-five cents?" continued the merchant.

"Henry, don't you known me?" called James.

"Or I can sell you der werry best socks in der market for only ten cents a pair. Shust look at 'em! Wanderbuilt and Shay Gould buy shust such socks as dose."

"You are my brother!"

"I sell baber collars for four cents a box!"

"My long lost brother!" and he rushed for him and both fell against the hot stove.

* * * * *

"Was he very drunk?" asked his Honor of the witness.

"He vhas, and he shoked me besides. But for my vhife he might have kilt me."

"It seems," continued the court as he turned to the prisoner, "that you have lost a brother?"

"Yes, sir."

"How long since?"

"He left home twenty years ago."

"Well, I think I know where he is. One day last week I sent a man, who looks just like you, to the Work House for sixty days."

"Yes, sir, but you—"

"And you can go up there and look for him. It is a great place for brothers to find each other."

"Your Honor, can't I—"

"Not to-day. Fall right back or you'll be too late for breakfast up there. Your sentence is the same—sixty days. All in the family, you see—call the next."

Home Influences Developing.

My Lady—"No, no, General. Do not talk to me of school and college! There's nothing like home influence for boys. My precious darling has never left my side since he was born—just twenty-one years ago this very day, General—and he has kept the heart of a child, and never given me an hour's anxiety in all his innocent life!"

The General—"Ah, he'll soon be wanting to marry the lady's maid, or something of that sort. See if he doesn't!"

My Lady—"Good Heavens. (To footman, who enters.) "Adams, where is Parker?"

The Footman—"She just stepped out for a minute this mornin', my Lady, to git some 'air-pins, she said. But they do say down stairs, as Master George were waiting for her round the corner with a four-wheel cab and a small porkmanteau. Leastwise, she never come home, nor Master George hasn't neither. Lunch is waiting, my Lady."—London Punch.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR.

WHAT TO DO IN EMERGENCIES.

Poison from Mushrooms.—After general treatment, stimulants, unless inflammatory symptoms present themselves. Tannic acid has been recommended.

Poison from Ivy.—Application of diluted carbolic acid.

Bites from Rabid Animals.—Wash or suck out at once; cauterize with argenti nitrate, potassa or the mineral acids; keep up bleeding by cupping and warm water; when slough separates keep up suppuration; belladonna and opium may be given internally.

Apoplexy.—Palliative, as horizontal position, with head raised, cool air, quiet, constriction of clothing removed; if stomach full a non-depressing emetic; two or three drops of ol. tiglii on the tongue unless there is anaemia is good practice. Cold to the head in all stages. If from "shock," stimulating enemata and baths. "Bleeding" is uncalled for save in unquestionable cases of congestion; where coma is profound, showing considerable hemorrhage, do not bleed. Artificial respiration of use.

Convulsions; Epileptic.—Unloosen patient's clothes; horizontal posture; fresh air; only a partial confinement of motions; cold water sprinkled in face. These will generally be sufficient.

Convulsions: Hysterical.—Diagnose from other convulsions by sensibility being incomplete; pupils undilated and responsive to light; pulse normal; no biting of tongue, no lividity of face. Treat by loosening clothes thoroughly; dash cold water on face and breast; close mouth and nostrils firmly for a moment, so the patient cannot breathe. Assafœtida, valeriana, lq. am. acetatis may be given.

Frost-bite.—Keep all warmth away till natural warmth comes back; friction with snow or ice-water; cold enemata of spirits or ammonia; dry friction.

Hemorrhage from Teeth Extraction.—Empty the sockets of all coagulum and plug with cotton, moistened with subsulphate of iron; over this apply a pad of dry cotton cloth and close the jaws firmly.

Bleeding from the Nose.—Unless it goes too far, need not alarm you; nay, in many cases may prevent something much more serious; but when it requires to be stopped, let the person sit upright, bathe the neck and face with cold water, and, if you can get a little alum, dissolve that in water, and squirt it up the nostrils; if this does not succeed, send for the doctor. I would not advise you to plug the nostrils, for unless it be done properly you may think the bleeding has ceased, whereas it is only finding its way to the top of the throat, and being swallowed.

Syncope or Fainting.—Loosen clothes; fresh air; place patient in a horizontal posture, with head low; sprinkle cold water over the face, and apply volatile substances to the nose; stimulants internally.

Read This Now or Never.

The very best remedy ever invented for the cure of general ill-health, especially dyspepsia, bad blood, nervousness, universal lassitude, weak kidneys, liver troubles, etc., is Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla. It will not harm the most delicate invalid. Its use wonderfully revives the mental faculties, increases the power of physical endurance, and makes the blood rich, red and pure, enabling it to counteract the effect of exhaustive and debilitating diseases. In localities where this remedy is best known, druggists find it difficult to supply the demand. It contains Yellow Dock, Sarsaparilla, Juniper, Iron, Buchu, Celery, Calisaya, etc. Every physician knows the merit of such ingredients.

The Idol of Hindoo Women.

Hindoo girls are taught to think of marriage almost as soon as they can talk; indeed, they are often contracted in marriage at six or seven years of age, and go to live with their husbands at twelve or thirteen. Before this, at the age of five, they are taught to propitiate the gods in order to secure a good husband, and their little minds are distracted by the idea of what a model husband ought to be. The orthodox conception is a husband like the god Siva, who was holy, austere, advanced in years, and faithful and devoted to one wife, the goddess Doorga. Good little girls revolt at the idea of a husband marrying a second wife while the first is alive, and will consequently confess their anxiety to marry a faithful spouse like Siva, and they learn from their elders to utter the most vindictive speeches against their rival wife. But, for all that, Krishna is the idol of Hindoo women, and he was anything but faithful to one wife. He not only kicked over her milk pans, ran away with the clothes of the milk-maids, but danced and flirted with other men's wives, eloped with royal damsels, and married an infinite number of beautiful women.

MR. E. B. ROLAND, of Covington, Ky., writes: "I had given up ever finding relief from the ills that afflicted me. I suffered greatly, both mentally and physically. Pimples and boils were all over me. The smallest cut or wound would cause a sore. My digestion troubled me, and my back and kidneys pained me severely. A friend recommended Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla. Thanks to its use, I am again in sound condition, and I never can grow weary of praising it to my acquaintances."

Natural Foes Living in Harmony.

Among other animal stories, Kingston relates the case of a parish or outcast dog that was thrown as food to a caged tiger in India. The dog stood on the defensive in a corner of the cage, and as often as the tiger attempted to molest him, seized it by the lip or neck. The tiger was hungry, but eventually, finding the dog so tough a customer to tackle, it relinquished its onslaughts, and came to an understanding with the foe. When a mess of rice and milk was put into his cage, the larger brute willingly shared it with its courageous opponent; and henceforth they became staunch friends; the dog would run in and out the cage, evidently looking upon it as his home, and indeed, making it such, until the tiger's death left it once more homeless and friendless.

"DO LIKEWISE."

DR. R. V. PIERCE, Buffalo, N. Y.: Dear Sir—"Five years ago I was a dreadful sufferer from uterine troubles. Having exhausted the skill of three physicians, I was completely discouraged, and so weak I could with difficulty cross the room alone. I began taking your 'Favorite Prescription,' and using the local treatment recommended in your 'Common Sense Medical Adviser.' In three months I was perfectly cured. I wrote a letter to my family paper, briefly mentioning how my health had been restored, and offering to send the full particulars to any one writing me for them and inclosing a stamped envelope for reply. I have received over four hundred letters. In reply I have described my case and the treatment used, and earnestly advised them to 'do likewise.' From a great many I have received second letters of thanks stating that they had commenced the treatment and were much better already."

The Tramp.

[Ingersoll.]

I sympathize with the wanderer, with the vagrant out of employment, with the sad and weary men who are seeking for work. When I see one of these men, poor and friendless—no matter how bad he is, I think that somebody loved him once—that he once had a mother—that he slept beneath her loving eyes and wakened in the light of her smile. I see him in the cradle, listening to lullabies sung soft and low, and his little face is dimpled as though by the rosy fingers of joy. And then I think of the strange and winding paths—the weary road he has traveled, from that mother's arms to vagrancy and want.

VOLTAIRE was once affected with something which he called decay of the stomach but which would probably be better termed debility of the stomach, or paralysis of the digestive function. For nearly a year he took no other nourishment than yolks of eggs, beaten up with flour and water, and thus was cured. This diet is thus prepared: Beat up an egg in a bowl, add six tablespoonfuls of cold water, mixing well together. Then add two tablespoonfuls of farina of potatoes; mix again thoroughly, and add as much boiling water as is necessary to convert the whole into a jelly. It can be taken alone or with the addition of a little milk.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

A Punishment Worse Than Death.

An execution to which more than passing interest attaches will take place in Windsor, Vermont. The condemned person is Emeline M. Meaker, of Waterbury, who was convicted of the murder of an orphan girl thirteen years old, Alice Meaker by name, April 22, 1880. The wretched woman protested her innocence on the occasion to set aside the verdict, as she has always done, but was sentenced to be hanged in the prison at Windsor on the last Friday of May, 1882. The crime, for which a son of Mrs. Meaker, Almon Meaker, is already under sentence of death, was one of the most horrible in even the criminal history of Vermont. The child was a half-sister to E. O. Meaker, husband of Emeline, and was an inmate of their household, where she was severely abused and maltreated, being treated, indeed, as a slave by Mrs. Meaker and Almon. Almon was a half-witted, pliant tool in the hands of his mother. Mr. Meaker is believed to be innocent of all complicity in either the abuse or the murder of the child. The child was taken from bed and dressed, a sack was tied over her head, and she was taken in a wagon to a lonely spot in the woods, where a dose of strychnine was given her, and she was left to die in a swamp. The crime was conclusively fixed upon the two wretched prisoners, and nothing can now save them from the terrible consequences. The time allowed the condemned to prepare for death is so long that the execution will undoubtedly be welcomed as a termination of the feeling of terror that will possess them.

A Good Family Remedy.
STRICTLY PURE.
Harmless to the Most Delicate.

By its faithful use Consumption has been cured when other Remedies and Physicians have failed to effect a cure.

JEREMIAH WRIGHT, of Marion county, W. Va., writes us that his wife had PULMONARY CONSUMPTION, and was pronounced INCURABLE by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam ENTIRELY CURED HER. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

WM. C. DIGGES, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes, April 4th, 1881, that he wants us to know that the LUNG BALSAM HAS CURED HIS MOTHER OF CONSUMPTION after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured; he thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

DR. MEREDITH, Dentist, of Cincinnati, was thought to be in the last STAGES OF CONSUMPTION and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough, and that he was able to resume his practice.

WM. A. GRAHAM & Co., Wholesale Druggists, Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of [illegible], a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with BRONCHITIS in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him, as it has many others, of Bronchitis.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, IND., FEBY. 23, 1882.

PETER COOPER is now over ninety-two years old, and still hale and hearty.

A BILL has been introduced in congress to repay citizens of Indiana for damages sustained by the Morgan raid during the rebellion.

THE Tammany Hall democrats in the New York legislature have gone over to the republicans in a body. This gives the latter the control of the legislation at Albany.

MRS. SCOVILLE, Guiteau's sister, has written a very pathetic letter to Mrs. Garfield asking her to have mercy on her brother, and intercede with the president in his behalf.

WILL Dorsey be in penitentiry when he receives his new brass medal, with "306" on it? Hardly. He will likely be hob-a-nobbing at Washington with the other leaders of his party.

CONGRESS is still working at the Blaine correspondence in the Peru matter. It begins to look as if the country is fortunate in being well rid of Blaine. He wanted to be a Bismarck, but didn't succeed.

THE Indianapolis News has the following: The secretary of the state health board has received notice from the Cass county clerk that Mrs. Dr. Ralshousen has been elected county physician and secretary of the county health board. This is the first instance in the state of a woman holding the position.

THE bill for the suppression of polygamy, and which passed the senate last week, provides that for every wife more than one, each of the saints shall be liable to a fine of $300 or to imprisonment six months, either or both. This will make Mormonism an expensive luxury, in which only the wealthy can indulge.

THE large oil tanks of the Pipe Line Co., near Olean N. Y., caught fire from an engine last week. They contained 105,000 barrels of oil. Ditches were dug around it to keep it from flowing into the stream and firing property along its course. A cannon was then fired into the the burning tanks, and the oil ran out, enabling the men to stop the further spread of the flames.

ENGLISH butchers are playing a sharp game with their customers. They sell meats to them as English, which are mostly brought from this country, thus receiving a higher price than they could obtain if they called it by its right name. There is one consolation, however, it may be said, that it is now a well established fact, that the American beef is far superior to that produced in England.

THE governor has been up to Michigan City recently, investigating the charges against Warden Murdock, of the states prison there. It was charged that the warden was making too much money off the state, by using the garbage and offal of the prison, and for which he paid the state only $300 a year. The governor, after carefully inquiring into the matter, made a report exonerating Mr. Murdock from all blame.

THE car works of the Pullman company, situated at Chicago, have had more trouble in regard to the wages of the men. The company will hereafter pay its employes monthly, instead twice a month as heretofore. They will no longer carry them to and from their houses in Chicago on railway trains free, but will charge them ten cents a day for round trip tickets. The men are dissatisfied with both changes and are likely to strike. The company employs 2,400 men.

THE sale of government swamp lands near Toledo has been postponed. Messrs. Foster and Hitt, in behalf of the state of Ohio, objected to the sale, and claimed the land as swamp ground for the state. Several parties filed claims for homestead and timber culture entries. Commissioner McFarland rejected all these claims, and an appeal was taken to the secretary. This tract of land is only used for hunting purposes, and a number of gentlemen wish to purchase it from the government and have it as a sort of hunting park. This is opposed by those who have been accustomed to hunt, and are apprensive that the sale will curtail their rights.

THE tariff is a nice thing when you wish to protect a first-class monopoly. There are six establishments in the United States where plate glass is manufactured. These employ about 950 hands, at an average of about $1.00 per day. A tariff of 112 per cent. is levied on all plate glass imported into this country, and last year there was collected from this source $436,000. The government could have obtained this money by levying a low rate of tariff on the imported goods, and the people could have purchased their supply that much cheaper. But then, these six establishments would not have been "protected" at the expense of fifty millions of people.

SNOWDEN, superintendent of the Philadelphia mint, has been urging congress to authorize superintendents of assay offices to receive both gold and silver bullion on deposits and to issue certificates therefore. These may be of denominations of $10 and upwards, and are to be used the same as other paper money now in circulation. Mr. Snowden thinks this plan will bring silver up to a par with gold. Possibly the accumulating coin in the United States vaults might be used the same way. Or why would it not be a good plan to take our accumulating specie as a security for the national bank circulation, as far as it would go, instead of having interest-bearing bonds used for that purpose.

DAKOTA is still asking admission into the Union. The latest bill proposed, changes the boundaries of the state so as to read: Commencing at a point on the west line of the state of Minnesota where forty-six degrees north latitude intersects the same, thence south along the west boundary line of the states of Minnesota and Iowa to a point at the intersection with the northern boundary line of the state of Nebraska, thence westerly along the northern boundary line of the state of Nebraska to the twenty-seventh meridian longitude west from Washington, thence north along the said twenty-seventh meridian to the forty-sixth degree north latitude, thence east along the forty-sixth degree north latitude to the place of beginning. The bill also provides for the organization of a state government.

IN response to a recent resolution of congress, the secretary of state sent to that body the correspondence between Blaine and our minister in Peru, in regard to the recent trouble into which he (Blaine) came so near getting us involved. It will be remembered that an American company claimed to have bought up the guano and saltpeter districts of Peru, and were trying to have our government establish a protectorate over the country so as to assist this company to hold its claims. These men have been asserting that Blaine and other public men in this country were favoring their claims. The following letter from Shipherd, the company's agent here, is now made public as stated above, and contains the names of the influential persons referred to. In a letter from Shipherd to Minister Hurlbut, dated New York, June 2, 1881, Shipherd says: "Among representative gentlemen with whom I have already, or shall soon be, in confidential negotiations in the premises, I may name such as these: E D Morgan, Wm. E Dodge, Hugh McCulloch, Norvin Green, W R. Garrison, A. Belmont, S. B. Chittenden, John Hay, Amasa Stone, Wm. H. Vanderbilt, John Sherman, Eugene Hale, Murat Halstead, Whitelaw Reid, Fisk & Hatch, Samuel Sloan, Marshall Jewell, H. L. Dawes, S. D. Babcock, John A. Stewart, Jay Cooke, Evarts, Southmayd & Choate, U. S. Grant, A. A. Lowe, J. H. Wade, H B. Payne, A. S. Hewitt, Joseph Medill, Horace White, David Dows & Co., W. L. Scott, J. D. Cameron, Howard Crosby, Hobson, Hurtado & Co., Sydney Dillon, Morton, Bliss & Co., H. B. Claflin, A. S Barnes, Henry Hilton, J. & W. Seligman & Co., M. K. Jessup & Co., Drexel, Morgan & Co., Wm. W, Astor and Horace T. Caswell."

Caution to Sugar-Makers.

You should be careful in boiling sugar water after night; especially when your chums are with you, and not have them call on Mrs. H. P. Duck, as they were so large last year that the little children could ride them for horses, and as there are more this year. Be careful and do not take the Jersey bull in mistake for a duck, as the feathers are sharp.

South Bend Register: Mrs. Abe Staples wrote a note to Mrs. D. S. Brownfield that she was coming down to spend the afternoon. The note was delivered by Mrs. Staple's little girl to Mrs. Brownfeld's little girl at school, but the latter lost it in attempting to deliver its contents orally, told her mother that Mrs. Staples wanted her to come up there and spend the afternoon. The result was that at about the same moment the ladies were ringing each others bells and receiving no response. Late in the afternoon they met by chance, the usual way, and an explanation followed.

SEED.

THE LARGEST IN THE WORLD CORN AND WATERMELONS.

CORN. Our "GIANT" Corn is a new and distinct variety, and is without the best that any farmer ever grew. The grains are as large as the average size chestnut; the finest white dent ever grown; full rich in starch, perfect hardy, and never failing to grow a strong and vigorous stalk, with firm, deep roots. The ears are uniform and of very large size. It will yield more than any other variety that can be raised, averaging from THREE to SIX EARS to the stalk. It is taking the place of all other varieties upon its first trial. It is matured, and can be gathered in TEN WEEKS, and grows as successfully in the North as the South.

WATERMELONS. Our "MIXON" Watermelons are the largest and finest in the World in every instance, and grow in any section of the country. Their average weight is from 75 to 125 POUNDS. The flesh is of a blood red, very solid, luscious, crisp and sugary—far surpassing all other varieties, and, although a melon of such an enormous weight, there is barely half an inch rind. They are pronounced the finest shipping melon in the World. It will pay any farmer to try a sample package.

Corn—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00, and $5.00 per bushel. Watermelons—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00. Address all orders to the

Such acts are very commendable and nice, keep out of litigations, and the courts and lawyers that much at least for his children.

The Relief Association

(Baltimore American, Feb 18th.)

At a recent quarterly meeting of the B. & O. Relief Association, held at Relay Station, the secretary submitted a report which shows its affairs to be in a most flourishing condition. This organization is quietly but effectively performing most valuable service, not only among the employes by protecting them from want, but to the company itself and is constantly developing new methods of usefulness. Although only started in May, 1880, the report referred to showed the issue of 22,150 maintenance policies, and on December 31,1881, an actual membership of 13,105 persons; also the payment of 5,557 claims for sick benefits, aggregating $74,769.50; of benefits on account of disablement from accidents aggregating $83,017.87, and of 128 death policies aggregating $30,420.81. These sums, with the payment of 1,168 physicians bills, amounting to $11,688,48, made a total expenditure of $200,316,22, disbursed for the relief of members on lines extending from Baltimore to Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Columbus, Sandusky, and Chicago. The association, through its corps of medical inspectors, not only superintends the hygienic and sanitary welfare of its members, but is also charged with a close supervision over the sanitary condition of the company's shops, stations, coaches, grounds, buildings, water, &c., to the manifest advantages of its service. The measure adapted by the association last fall to guard employes of the company from effects of malaria which was unusually prevalent everywhere and said to have been effective in neutralizing its effects. Pursuing the same policy immediately upon the discovery that small-pox was becoming epidemic in the United States, the society undertook the gratuitous vaccination of all its members, and in special cases of their families. Reports already show that the medical inspectors have vaccinated 5,170 persons; also that of the total number vaccinated fully 80 per cent, of operations were successful. In other words, out of 5,170 persons, over 4,000 were found to be exposed to the full effects of small-pox, which has been declared by the National Board of Health to be epidemic throughout the country. The employes referred to are not resident in any circumscribed locality, though probably half are residents in Maryland. The statistics, therefore, furnished a sad commentary upon the danger to which our entire population is exposed through a lack of proper precautionary measures. If other benevolent societies and corporations would recognize the fact that prevention is of far greater value than the cure of disease, and would follow the worthy example of the B. & O. Association, they would not only be acting humanely, but would also in many instances save their own funds from many depletion.

Clairvoyant and Female Physician

This most celebrated lady, gifted with second sight, will remain for a short time at the Swineford house, Auburn, Ind., where she can be consulted from 9 a. m. to 9 p. m. This well-known medium is the wonder of the age. She tells you the past, present, and future, gives you correct information about all business matters, family affairs, lost or stolen property, etc. Locates all diseases, and gives entire satisfaction to all who consult her. Those who are sick or in trouble, will do well to call on this wonderful lady, as she remains but a short time. Everything strictly confidential. Charges ladies 50 cents, gents $1.00. English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian spoken.

Mrs. St. Clair is accompanied by her husband, the celebrated French specialist, who consults free of charge.

—In replying last week to what we said about his extraordinary objections to a recent item in this paper, the Butler Record comes out with a confused half colum of most remarkable and contradicting non-essentials. The only point we are able to distinguish is, that he don't want Conkling and the "306" sent "thundering down the ages." Well, we don't blame him for that. Our experience in that line has not been assuring. We remember a party of students who were "out on the hills away" geologizing. A sad-eyed youth broke his hold on a bush, and went "thundering down the (geologic) ages," and when he landed just below the azoic 'age,' in a mud hole, he looked very much like a lost cud that some ruminating cow had fired out. None of that party has ever cared about "thundering down the ages" since. Now, whether this article is any nearer to matter the Record is after than his own, we can't say, but are willing to leave the subject to an indulgent posterity, that may possibly care more about it than we do.

—Monday witnessed a marvelous change in the weather. The drizzly rain changed early in the evening to a cold sleet, followed next morning by a slight snow. The sleet was unusually heavy and did a considerable damage to trees, and some of our people fear it will injure the fruit buds. Telegraph poles are broken down on all the lines running through the county, and no doubt a good deal of damage will be the result.

One of these days this Sunday gambling will get some one into trouble. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

Several of them had the presence of mind to crouch up against the walls of the tunnel a couple of feet outside the track, and thus made their escape, but five of their companions were struck by the locomotives, hurled forward on the tracks and their bodies then torn and mutilated by the wheels of the cars. A Remarkable Plant.

Anise grows wild in Egypt, in Syria, Palestine and all parts of the Levant, but the Romans considered the Egyptian and Cretan anise to be the best, especially for medicinal purposes. The product of Southern Europe is now looked upon with favor. Among the ancients anise seems to have been a common pot-herb in every garden. Although it is less used in medicine by the moderns than by the ancients, it still retains its former reputation as an excellent stomachic, particularly for delicate women and young children. The Romans showed it in order to keep up an agreeable moisture in the mouth, and to sweeten the breath, while some Orientals still do the same. Some of the Persian poets have sung the agreeable qualities of the anise, and a modern sweet ballad of Rome compares the slender grace of a young girl to the anise.

Anise is an annual plant growing to the height of one foot, carries a white flower, and blooms from June till August. The seeds are imported and used in large quantities on account of their aromatic and carminative properties. The distilled plant, when used in blossom, yields a sweeter and more gratful tincture than can be obtained from the seeds. Anise is extensively employed by the confectioner for the purpose of flavoring comfits and cordials. The anise seed cordial of the shops is a compound of alcohol, anise seed and angelica. The oil is obtained by distillation from the seeds, and though habitually mixed with a great many cattle medicines, and regarded by the farmers of former generations as one of the most potent drugs, it performs scarcely any other office than the communicating of an agreeable fragrance. The Chinese cultivate it for the seasoning of dishes; and the Japanese employ bundles and garlands of it in the ceremonies of their heathenish superstition. Its appearance, when out of flower, as well as when in bloom, is decidedly ornamental.

GAIL HAMILTON has only two hates. She hates a man with a white face and a woman who has dyspepsia. Outside of these she gets along quite peaceably with the world.

DOINGS OF CONGRESS.

The measure for placing Gen. Grant on the retired list came up in the Senate on the 10th, but was laid over because Mr. Logan was absent. Mr. Maxey urged the enlargement of the Mexican-war list, and Mr. Beck expressed his willingness to aid needy and deserving veterans, but not to others. In the House Mr. Guenther reported a resolution of inquiry as to the practicability of lowering the dam constructed for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers. The House went into committee of the whole on the private calendar and took up and passed the bill authorizing the President to appoint to a Captaincy in the army T. D. Kirby, who was cashiered for drunkenness when a brevet Brigadier General. The Secretary of the Treasury submitted a report showing that twenty-nine employes of the Internal Revenue Department had been killed and fifty wounded while enforcing the laws against moonshiners. Both houses adjourned to Monday, 13th. At a caucus of Republican Senators, held after adjournment, it was determined to resist any motion to bring up Harris' resolution for the appointment of Neil Brown as acting Chief Clerk of the Senate.

A bill for the sale of the Miami lands in Kansas was passed by the Senate on Feb. 13th, and a measure was introduced for the disposition of the Fort Larned reservation in Kansas. The bill for the relief of Samson Goliath, which involves the right of Congress to remit the sentence of a court-martial, was recommitted at the request of Mr. Logan. Mr. Ingalls introduced an act to adjust the claims of the confederated Peoria Indians of Kansas, and Mr. Hill a bill to provide suitable agricultural lands for the Southern Utes. Mr. Vest made a favorable report on the bill for a public building at Jefferson City, and Mr. Harris introduced a similar measure for Chattanooga. The Senate in executive session, after some discussion, confirmed the appointment of Col. Rucker as Quartermaster General. In the House Mr. Davis introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for correspondence and other information in regard to encroachments upon the harbor of Chicago. A resolution was adopted calling for facts concerning the perils of American missionaries in Persia. Mr. Young introduced a bill to create the office of Mining Commissioner, with a salary of $4,000. Mr. Herndon proposed a constitutional amendment limiting the number of members of the House to 325. The Supplemental Census bill was passed. For two and a half hours the clerks were kept busy reading bills. Among them were measures to prohibit polygamists from voting or holding office in the Territories, for a ship canal from Lake Ponchartrain to the Mississippi, to reduce the whisky tax to 50 cents per gallon, to aid in erecting monuments on Revolutionary battle-fields, to abolish the national banks, and to prevent the spread of infectious diseases among cattle.

Mr. McDill introduced a bill in the Senate, on the 14th, appropriating $100,000 for the purchase of governors to regulate the flow of gas in public buildings. Mr. Edmunds was defeated in an attempt to take up the Anti-Polygamy bill out of its regular order. Mr. Vance made a speech deploring the high-protective policy of the Government as retarding the growth of the South. Among the nominations sent to the Senate by President Arthur were those of John C. New, of Indiana, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; E. H. Nevin, Jr., to be Surveyor of Customs at Philadelphia; Moses M. Drew, to be Marshal for California; and H. M. Van Arman, of San Francisco, to be Secretary of the Territory of Arizona. In the House, Mr. Willetts reported a bill to prevent polygamists from holding civil office in the Territories or serving as Delegates in Congress. Mr. Orth made an adverse report on the resolution of Mr. Robinson calling on the Attorney General for an opinion as to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in Great Britain. The Apportionment bill was taken up, and Mr. Oates argued in favor of fixing the number of Representatives at 250. Mr. Herbert desired to speak on the question, but the confusion in the hall prevented his being heard, and the House adjourned.

Mr. Jackson introduced a bill in the Senate on the 15th appropriating $150,000 to make good the loss sustained at the hands of Federal troops, in 1864, by the Methodist book-house at Nashville. A resolution was passed to provide messengers for seven leading committees at $1,400 per year. The Anti-polygamy bill was debated for two hours. The report of the commission on the cattle plague was sent to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury. It shows that no lung disease exists in the western centers of live-stock traffic. Four Dutch cows imported into Massachusetts brought a plague, which was eradicated in six years at a cost of $77,000. In the House a bill was introduced by the Committee on Agriculture making the Department of Agriculture an executive department of the Government, greatly extending its powers and duties, and providing for a Secretary of Agriculture who shall receive the same salary as is paid to chiefs of other executive departments. The Appropriation bill was discussed in the House.

The United States Senate took up the anti-polygamy bill on the 16th. Mr. Vest denounced it as a bill of attainder. Mr. Pendleton objected to the feature excluding known polygamists from the jury-box. Mr. Sherman thought it was nearly time for a revelation against polygamy. By a party vote, it was agreed that not more than three of the Commissioners to be selected shall belong to the same political organization. The bill was then passed by a unanimous vote. In the House of Representatives, a bill was passed granting Mrs. Garfield a pension of $5,000 per annum. Bills were favorably reported to regulate the collection of tax on weiss beer, to admit Dakota as a State, to provide additional training schools for Indian youth, to erect public buildings at Columbus, Erie, and Leavenworth, and to fix the term of internal revenue Collectors at four years. The Apportionment bill was taken up. Mr. Seaton's method was defeated by 9 to 148, and a resolution was passed that the basis of division shall be that used in the Forty-sixth Congress. Mr. Anderson's amendment to fix the number of Representatives at 325 was adopted by 162 to 104. After an unseemly wrangle it was discovered that no quorum was present.

Florence Nightingale.

Florence Nightingale was born at Florence, Italy, in the month of May, 1820. Her father was William E. Shore, a banker, who inherited the estates of Peter Nightingale, and, as the will provided, changed his name to that of the person whose property fell to him. Florence was the younger daughter. She enjoyed all the advantages, which were numerous, of persons in affluent circumstances, and early in life attained remarkable proficiency in several branches of education. Very soon her philanthropic instincts led her to study, systematically, the best ways and means to ameliorate the condition of the race, physically and morally. In the search for information, she took up her abode in 1851 in the institution of Protestant Sisters of Mercy, established at Kaiserswerth, on the Rhine. Soon her activity showed itself, and we find her aiding personally and pecuniarily the Governesses, Sanatorium, which was restored and given a thorough reorganization. This work had scarcely been accomplished when Miss Nightingale had her attention directed to the inefficiency and mismanagement of the British military hospitals in the Crimea. One of the plans suggested for their reform was the formation of a select band of lady superintendents and of nurses to direct and minister in the hospital wards. Miss Nightingale, at the request of the late Lord Herbert, then Secretary of War, undertook the organization and conduct of that body, and soon, where confusion had reigned, there was order, and, by affording care and consolation, she alleviated the sufferings of all, saved the lives of many, and received the benedictions of a nation. A testimonial fund of £50,000, subscribed by the public in recognition of her noble services, was, at her special request, devoted to the formation and maintenance of an institution for the training and employment of nurses. Miss Nightingale has greatly assisted the cause by her writings. Her name is a household word in Great Britain, and, indeed, all over the Christian world it is the synonym of earnest, successful work in behalf of the sick and suffering.

GUITEAU'S PRESENTS.

The Curious Things That Have Been Sent to the Assassin.

The popular reprobation of the assassin's crime is still manifested in different ways. The common mode of expressing the feeling against the assassin, says a correspondent, is to send a rope suggestively noosed. These ropes began to come by express and mail before the trial, and are still coming in. They have been sent to the District Attorney, to Mr. Scoville, to the Warden of the jail, and to the assassin himself. A little room at the jail is strewn with ropes received from various parts of the country. Some of them are ropes such as are generally used in executions, with the conventional hangman's noose skillfully made. Many other little reminders of the fate that awaits him come in the mail to the assassin, but the Warden, as a rule, keeps them from his eyes.

Cheap comic valentines, representing the gallows with a dangling victim, are also sent to the assassin. In every nook in the District Attorney's office can be found some testimonial of popular feeling respecting the assassin. Many of the things received have been destroyed. In one corner of Mr. Corkhill's private office is a little heap of ropes. A bundle of switches was sent to the scoundrel from Florida. A citizen of Osceola, Iowa, in order to testify to his feeling in a unique way, invested $6.50 in a pair of white kids and a fine white satin tie, the tips of which he dyed blood red. He sent these with a request that they be worn by the culprit on the scaffold, the red marks to testify the innocent blood of his victim. They now form a part of the District Attorney's museum.

From Ohio came the little wooden box, opened on one side. It contained a miniature scaffold, on which a paper image of a man was hanging, while a score of paper women were hauling on the rope. They were, according to the inscription on the box, "the women of Ohio."

Among other curiosities saved by the District Attorney is a miniature scaffold and coffin, very neatly constructed, and a gallows-tree, with an effigy six or seven inches long suspended upon it. There is also a little coffin, the open lid of which exposes a death's head. The coffin is inscribed "Strangulatus pro diabolo, 1882."

All sorts of pictures, cartoons and letters have been received and destroyed. During the early part of the trial a great many gags of various patterns, the common form being a corncob with strings tied at each end, were received, with a request that they be applied to the prisoner. Some of these have been preserved. In the same connection may be mentioned various pots of glue and mucilage, sent with the suggestion that the villain's mouth be glued up. Many patent-medicine firms, doubtless with an eye to an advertisement, sent the District Attorney samples of their wares, proposing that he dose himself with the mixtures so that his health should not fail him until he had convicted the prisoner.

The District Attorney has also received a large amount of Confederate money to be turned over to the prisoner. One imposing testimonial letter, signed "Citizens," contained one copper penny to be given to Mr. Scoville to aid in the defense. A letter received from New Waterford, Conn., from a rope-maker, proposed to make for the assassin a red, white and blue rope out of silk or any other material the District Attorney might select. One of the most ghastly curiosities in the museum is a black cap sent by an unknown friend of justice.

A letter that came from Chicago suggested as the proper mode of execution that the assassin be fastened to a rope 300 feet long, the other end being attached to a balloon, which would give him a veritable "flight to glory."

The demon, according to Warden Crocker, has become as docile as a lamb; doesn't insist upon having his own way as he did during the trial, and does what he is ordered to do without a murmur. He has lost much of his accustomed bravado, and does not become so excited when in conversation. Gen. Crocker states that he does not believe any man under sentence of death ever more fully appreciated the awful situation than the condemned. He has become very much depressed in spirits, and shows it. He behaves with perfect decorum, and there is not a sign of insanity in his conversation or actions. He is denied the privilege of seeing visitors now altogether, and this seems to worry him.

Popular Names in New York.

The city has a variety of localities whose names sound strange to unfamiliar ears, and hence are among the peculiarities of the metropolis. There is "Mackerelville," and also "Cowboy," and many other spots noted in the police reports. Among the more notorious is "Hell's Kitchen," which was brought before the public by the Rooney murder. "Hell's Kitchen" is a series of rookeries inhabited by a class deeply sunk in misery, but notwithstanding poverty they always have money for whisky. Rooney only beat his wife to death—which is so common a thing here that it hardly calls for more than passing notice. "Hell's Kitchen" is no worse than "Murderer's Row" or "Devil's Eelpot," each of which has its record. Then, too, look at the fanciful names enjoyed by an important element in our population. There are the "Short Boys," the "Dead Rabbits," the "Man Eaters," and others, who not only vote, but often control elections, and also do their share to fill the penitentiary. "Hell's Kitchen" is a richly remunerative investment to the landlord, for the poor always pay highest rent, and the tenements of this city are immensely profitable. This class of property holders claim respectability, and may live in elegant style, while their wealth is wrung from the most miserable of mankind.—New York Letter.

Blaine and Arthur.

A Washington telegram says: A friend of the President said to-day that it always took two parties to make a quarrel, and that Mr. Blaine would not have very much success in keeping himself prominent before the country on the issue made with the President, because the President does not intend to take any further notice of the matter. In other words, the administration people propose to allow Mr. Blaine to go ahead and say and do what he pleases, and have it all his own way for a time. On the other hand, Mr. Blaine's friends claim that they will be able to make such a showing to the country in a short time that silence upon the part of the administration will suit them only too well.

DEATH is the tyrant of the imagination. His reign is in solitude and darkness; in tombs and prisons; over weak hearts and seething brains. He lives without shape or sound, a phantasm; inaccessible to sight or touch; a ghastly and terrible apprehension.

ADDITIONAL NEWS.

IN the Virginia Senate, at Richmond, on the 16th, Mr. Newberry offered a resolution that, as the Legislature of Virginia, when elected, was undoubtedly believed by the people of the State fully competent to do the legislative work of the commonwealth, and as Senator Mahone had been elected to go to Washington, to act there as Senator for the State, instead of doing which he was spending his time in Richmond, interfering with the proceedings of the Legislature, the Legislature formally tender the said Senator Mahone a firm but polite invitation to go to Washington, and there to attend to his own business.

DOCTOR BILLS.

How the Congressional Committee Will Remunerate Garfield's Surgeons and Attendants.

The time in which bills could be filed with the Committee on Accounts of Garfield's Illness expired on the 10th inst. A Washington telegram says: There have been all sorts of claims presented, the only conceivable ones withheld being those of railroads for transportation, etc., they declining to make any charge for their services. The statements made by the surgeons as to the amount of labor and attention they gave to the case will not at present be made public, but, though they make no distinct charges, it is evident that Drs. Bliss, Hamilton and Agnew do not expect less than $25,000 or $30,000 each. A member of the committee, talking with a Herald correspondent this evening about the matter, gave it as his opinion that they would be awarded very much less. He could only speak for himself, but, from informal discussions of the matter among members of the committee, he was inclined to believe that the amounts for the leading surgeons would be from $7,000 to $10,000. Dr. Boynton's services are recognized as being very valuable in the case, and there is a disposition on the part of a large majority of the committee to class him with those receiving the greatest reward. Drs. Reyburn, Barnes and Woodward will not get so much. If the leading members of the staff get from $7,000 to $10,000, it is reasonable to infer that the others will receive from $3,000 to $5,000 each. Miss Dr. Edson's claim is not to be ignored, and she will probably get a sum not far from that awarded to Drs. Barnes, Woodward and Reyburn. Steward Crump, as well as Miss Edson, suffered greatly in health from his long watch, and, in fact, expended $600 in doctor's bills during his own illness in consequence; and these facts will not be overlooked by the committee in making awards. Drs. Barnes and Woodward were desirous of being promoted instead of receiving any reward of money. Dr. Barnes, who ranks as Brigadier General in the army, wants to retire with the rank of Major General, and Dr. Woodward wanted to be promoted from Major to Colonel. This in the long run would prove more remunerative than a simple cash payment of $5,000. One reason why the committee will classify the amounts to be awarded, is because some of the surgeons assumed more responsibility than others, and were naturally called upon to undertake more of the management of the case. In compensating Dr. Boynton, Miss Edson, Steward Crump and others, the committee is influenced by the feeling of great responsibility and the burden of care which they severally bore, not only because the President was to them an intimate friend, but because he was the Chief Magistrate of the nation, and the results of his death might, in a measure, prove disastrous to the country. In that light the committee regard them not merely as nurses, but as ministering, with self-devotion, to the welfare of the nation.

A Real Need.

Amusement in itself is a real need, which always makes itself felt, and in some way or other is sure to get supplied. It is not, as some suppose, a sort of superfluous luxury which should be patiently waited for till all other desirable advantages are secured; it is rather a deep seated necessity, which, in all circumstances, must and will be satisfied, if not from fountains pure and sweet, then from sources unwholesome and corrupt. The young need it more than the old, the busy more than the idle, the poor more than the rich; but all need it, and all in some form obtain it.

Half a dozen such Noses would make a Gaudy Fourth of July Celebration. It is too bad that such a lovely-tinted Nose should have such a Homely Man Behind it. The Nose has cost the Man a great Deal of Borrowed Money. If it were not for the Nose a great many Breweries would Close and a great many Distilleries would Suspend. If the Man drinks too much Water, his Nose will lose its Color. He must be careful about this. How many such Noses would it Take to make a Rainbow half a Mile long? Ask the Man to let you Light your Cigar by his Nose.

Comfort from Newspapers.

Many years ago, in one of the severe winters when there was much hardship among the poor, a city paper suggested that old newspapers, spread over the bed, would form an excellent substitute for blankets and coverlets. This brought upon the journal a great deal of harmless ridicule from other papers, but it brought comfort to many a poor family. In the matter of bed-clothing, especially, we are apt to associate warmth with weight, and do not consider that there is no warmth in the coverings themselves, but that they merely prevent the heat of the body from passing off. Whatever is a poor conductor of heat will make a warm covering. Paper itself is a poor conductor, but still poorer are the thin layers of air that are confined when two or three newspapers are laid upon one another. A few newspapers laid over the bed will keep one much warmer than some of the heavy, close-woven blankets. We do not propose newspapers as a substitute for blankets and comforters, but it is one of those make-shifts that it is well to know. In traveling one may, by the aid of a few papers, secure a comfortable rest in a thinly-clad bed, and if we cannot afford to give a destitute family a blanket or a comforter, we may show them how to increase the usefulness of their thin coverings by stitching a few layers of newspapers between them. It may be well to remind those who grow window-plants that, by removing them away from the window, and arranging a cover of newspapers over them, they may be preserved from harm in severely cold nights. With the plants, as with ourselves, it is not so much that cold comes in as that the heat goes off, and often a slight protection will prevent the escape of heat.—American Agriculturist.

Hyperbole of the Plains.

[Laramie City Boomerang.]

We flit through the dreamy hours of summer like swift-winged bumblebees amid the honeysuckle and pumpkin blossoms, storing away perhaps a little glucose honey and buckwheat pancakes for the future, but all at once, like a newspaper thief in the night, the king of frost and zipe, yellow chillblains is upon us, and we crouch beneath the wintry blast and hump our spinal column up into the crisp air like a Texas steer that has thoughtlessly swallowed a raw cactus.

A man named Gellespie, who died from small-pox, had been conveyed to the burial spot on a dray, the body being in a coffin and the latter placed in a carefully-sealed box. The drayman's next load happened to be some bags, and, when the owner discovered the fact that the bags were on the dray which had been used for the small-pox patient, he threw them all into the canal.

PROF. HORACE S. GILLETTE, of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, died at Indianapolis of rheumatic gout. Prof. Gillette was born in New York in 1810 and early in life was a lawyer. About 1840 he turned his attention to the education of deaf-mutes, and was engaged in the Columbus, (Ohio,(asylum. He afterward took charge of the Tennessee institute at Knoxville, where he remained until 1855, when he was employed in the Indiana institute, where he has since been.

THE noble Miamis are said to be fast blowing in the money paid them by the Government. When the Indians left Cogwill's office and went to the banks to cash their checks they were followed by their creditors, and as soon as the money was has handed over the pale-faces demanded their pounds of flesh. Most of the proud Miamis were cleaned out, and a large proportion of the money went into the tills of low groggeries. Of the $30,000 paid out in Wabash to the Indians, it is estimated $25,000 was squandered before nightfall.—Fort Wayne Sentinel.

FORT WAYNE has been convulsed by a big social sensation. Miss Nellie Fleming, daughter of William Fleming, ex-State Treasurer, and Director of the Chicago, New York and St. Louis road, eloped with Tony Trentman, and went to Detroit, where they were married. Trentman is a notorious gambler and hard character generally, but is a member of a highly-respectable family, being a brother of Augustus C. Trentman, a well-known wholesale grocer of Fort Wayne. Miss Fleming is a beautiful brunette, and has for several years been a leader in Fort Wayne society.

A CORRESPONDENT sends from Bedford the following particulars of the killing of Nicholas Bawn, Zachariah Whitted and Virgil Wilcox, at Tunnelton, Lawrence county: For a long time Tunnelton and its vicinity has been infested by a band of thieves and burglars, who have done pretty much as they pleased. Travelers have been stopped on the highways and robbed, and farmers have had stock and feed stolen from them. Yet such was the horror the robbers created in the community that but few if any could be found who were willing to prosecute for fear of arson or bodily injury at the hands of the band. A few days ago, according to the story that Ben Willoughby, the man who betrayed his confederates, tells, four persons—himself, Nicholas Bawn, Virgil Wilcox and Zachariah Whitted—entered into a conspiracy to carry out a plan which embraced burglary, arson and murder, and but for Willoughby weakening and making a clean breast of the affair they might have been to a great extent successful. He says, in the first place, they were to burglarize the saloon of A. Myers on the supposition that a large amount of money was concealed in the building. From the saloon they were to go to the residence of Mr. Thos. Clark, a wealthy citizen, call him out if possible, kill him and then rob the house. If successful, after this the next thing on the programme was to fire a vacant building that stands on the outskirts of the village, and, while excited people were drawn to the scene of the conflagration, break open the store and office of Messrs. A. Guthrie & Son, pork-packers and merchants, and rob the safes of their contents. Then they were to leave the country. They did leave the country, but not as they intended. On Sunday morning Willoughby for some cause or other revealed the whole affair to Mr. Clark, Mr. Myers and one or two others, and measures were at once taken to capture or kill the burglars. It was agreed to place a number of men armed with shotguns in such a position that they could see the window of the saloon the thieves were to enter, and not be seen themselves. Promptly at the hour named the burglars appeared at the window, Willoughby with them, as agreed upon, wearing a pair of white pantaloons that he might be known and not injured. Bawn whistled, and Wilcox soon had the window opened and entered, then Willoughby stepped around the corner of the building out of the way. A pistol was fired by one of the citizens in ambush, and in a second almost the three frightened burglars got out of the window onto the platform, which is about three feet above the ground. They were no sooner out than a volley of shots was sent at them, prostrating all of them, but not preventing them from getting off and crawling under the platform. The citizens then called upon them to come out, throw away their arms and surrender. They agreed to do this if assured they would not be shot. It is said this assurance was given, and they came out and threw away their pistols some distance from them. No sooner had they done this than a perfect hail of shot and bullets was sent at them. Whitted dropped dead on the spot, Bawn fell mortally wounded, and Wilcox, although badly wounded, ran some distance, when he received another shot which brought him to the ground in a dying condition. It is asserted that just after he fell a young man stepped up, placed a shot-gun against his head and blew the top of it almost off. Bawn died next night. He was but a boy, being only about 18 years of age, but was a bad character. The other two, especially Wilcox, were noted for their lawlessness of character. Willoughby is by no means a saint, and was a few years ago in jail here charged with murder, but was acquitted. It is reported that Willoughby has fled the country through fear of vengeance on the part of the dead men's friends. The verdict of the Coroner is, "Came to death f.om the effect of gunshots fired by unknown persons."

Bombastes Blaine.

Mr. Blaine has plenty of leisure, and plenty of money, and an inexhaustible stock of assurance. Just now he is engaged in the active business of keeping himself before the public as a supposed candidate for the Presidency in 1884. The rings, the jobbers, the lobbyists and the schemers who cluster about Washington, and who call themselves Republicans and Democrats for convenience, are ardent advocates of the plumed knight, who, being on the retired list, has nothing to do but to set up windmills and attack them furiously.

No former Secretary of State ever wasted as much dispatch paper, in the same space of time, as this enterprising aspirant for the White House did in the eight months that he blustered and fumed about that department, to the terror of all Europe, Asia and Africa, and the Chilian part of the American continent. And he appears to have kept the clerks under him employed night and day, for he was so satisfied with his performances that he had copies of all the dynamite dispatches made, and carried them off, claiming, as he did in the case of the Mulligan letters, they were his private property.

In the midst of the terrible commotion caused by the alarming letter of the formidable ex-Secretary "To the President of the United States"—no longer "My dear Mr. President"—comes the news from Panama that the Congress of South American nations, which was to have met there on the 1st of December, had failed, and the few delegates who did meet had "returned to their homes much disgusted at the apathy displayed by their neighbors among the various republics along the coast."

These South American states of Latin origin evidently do not appreciate projects for a general congress. The splurging Secretary who invited them to come to Washington, to discuss terrapin and canvas-backs between the sherry and the champagne, must have known of this disinclination when he ordered Mr. Trescott to persuade them to accept his hospitality, for which Congress would be expected to foot the big bill.

This Bombastes Furioso of diplomacy, got up a project for a congress of "all the American nations to assemble in the city of Washington" next November. Not satisfied with a general circular, to make sure of the proposed guests he instructed Mr. Trescott, on his return to the United States, to call on some of them, and to repeat the invitation in person. Mr. Frelinghuysen thought his predecessor too hospitable by far, and revoked the instruction to Trescott. Whereupon the belligerent Blaine, with a blast of his war trumpet, calls the ringster clans to muster and to save this country from a surrender to the despots of the Old World.

Mr. Blaine is a very smart man as the world goes. The trouble with him is that he is much too smart for the common run of mankind. He is never content with being smart enough. This is a great misfortune for a patriot, a statesman, a hero in time of war, and a trading politician at all times.

Amid all the noise and confusion of this South American business, gotten up to divert public attention, the lobbery at the bottom of it may be said to stick out palpably to sharp eyes. Mr. Blaine made his Roman virtue manifest to all the world when he instructed his faithful minister, Hurlbut "not to extend the good offices of this Government in behalf of the Cochet claim" for a trifle of a thousand millions, more or less. That demand shocked him. He investigated it carefully, as he promised Shipherd's Peruvian Company to do. With the best intentions, he could not stand a thousand millions.

But when the same enterprising firm came in with the Landreau claim, modestly asking a few hundred millions, Mr. Blaine's "policy" was vigorously developed. He would allow no intrusion on this continent. The Monroe doctrine meant Landreau in full, and woe betide any European power, potentate or Prince that would deny it. Disinterested "Democratic" organs that had magnanimously defended Brady rushed to the support of the Secretary. First of all they were Americans, and politics must be discarded for great principles, and for Kemble's noble trinity of addition, division and silence.

Mr. Blaine therefore directed the ingenuous Hurlbut "to use his good offices with the Peruvian Government, to the end that it would designate one of its own courts or tribunals before which Landreau could appear and have the justice of his claim tested." Calderon was Provisional President, and he had been "seen." He was ready to do what the Commissioner of Venezuela did in making the ring awards. He would sign away all the territory the Landreau patriots wanted on afternoon, and then retire, rich and contented to Paris.

Chili got word of the intended job and carried off the Provisional President just before he could sell the remains of his unfortunate country. Then it was that the wrath of Hurlbut became absolutely heroic. And when the news of this "treachery" reached Washington the great pile of granite which the profane Mullett had dedicated to the hating architecture gods shook as if convulsed by a South American earthquake.

Chili had dared to interfere with the "American policy" of the Secretary, who stands alone. Chili had carried off Calderon. Chili would appropriate the guano and the nitrates that were intended for the Landreau party to indemnify her war expenses. Chili had committed a great "offense" against the United States and against Mr. Blaine in particular. We are free to admit that Mr. Blaine has a grievance, and he is not to be blamed for ventilating it every day in the week. Any man's feelings would be hurt at a Probate Judge who threw him out of a big share in a will of several hundred millions for want of a good codicil.

Mr. Blaine's indignation was natural, and from his standpoint he had no other recourse than to threaten Chili with war for seizing Calderon before he executed the deeds to Landreau and Company. If Chili had politely waited for a single day to pass away, and thus have put Mr. Blaine's self-sacrificing friends in possession of the nitrate beds and the guano deposits, his son would never have escorted Mr. Trescott on a special mission, there would have been no eructations from the war stomach of the belligerent Minister, and the remainder of poor Peru would have been transferred to the pockets that are now gaping in emptiness.—Washington letter.

A Disgraceful Union.

The Cincinnati Gazette looks with some concern upon the division of the Republican party. By way of advice to the factions which threaten to nullify its strength altogether, it points to an interesting bit of history:

"He is no friend of the party or of its principles who encourages dissension. It will require a united party to succeed in 1884, as it did in 1880 and 1876."

The Republicans were barely successful in 1880, no more. If the stalwarts had persisted in their idea of being sulky, New York, and with it the Presidency, would have been lost. In 1876 the party were successful only because they were united. But what a union!

The votes went against them, and their boldest, most shameless leaders conceived the plan of changing the result by fraud. The idea took. Some of them hesitated at the unheard-of enormity of the plan, for instance Senator Conkling and his friend Senator Jones; but they shrank from the responsibility of upholding truth and right against the passions of their party.

Zach Chandler managed the project, and Stoughton, Sherman, Garfield and all the other visiting statesmen went down to Louisiana and Florida and perfected it. Even then, if there had been any brave, outspoken Republican to condemn it, it might never have been consummated. The foulest stain ever put on a people would not have made its mark here. To the undying shame of the Republican party, it was as much of a unit in the determination to make Hayes President after Tilden had received the majority of the electoral votes as it was in voting for Hayes in the first place.

With regard to the crime of 1876, the Republicans seem now to be a unit on one other point. They have no other feeling than that of disgust for the base creature they put in the White House. Zach Chandler, the chief actor in the drama, was loudest in his expressions of contempt for Hayes. When even a Republican newspaper mentions him now, it is always with a slur, showing that his true character and position are receiving only a clearer recognition. They all turn from him as a horror-stricken criminal turns with rage and loathing from the instrument with which the crime was done.

The Republicans were a unit all through 1876, but now the two chief factions of the party have become so sharply defined and so hostile toward each other that our Cincinnati contemporary is alarmed for the unity of the party. It will be a fortunate thing when it is broken up. When a party is so perverted, so unflinching in its determination to keep the control of the Government, that the introduction of fraud as a party measure is not enough to break it up, but it requires the development of two ambitious and irreconcilable factions before there can come even the faintest sound of remonstrance or disapproval, that party is not worthy the support of honest, patriotic men.—New York Sun.

Defective Hearing in Children.

Dr. Weil, of Stuttgart, has during the last year examined 4,500 school-children in reference to their hearing. The examination, which included boys and girls of all social classes, yielded the following results; (1) A normal ear can in a quiet neighborhood hear whispering of ordinary loudness at a distance of twenty to twenty-five metres; (2) defects of hearing are exceedingly common—in the public schools 30 per cent of the children were found to have imperfect hearing in one ear, while a still larger percentage were found not normal; (3) among the children of well-to-do parents the figures are more favorable than among those of the poor; (4) the percentage of defective hearing increases with age; (5) country schools yield relatively better results than city schools. Most of those whose hearing had been found abnormal had never been subjected to any treatment, and many had no suspicion even of their failing, just as in cases of color-blindness. Not a few of these children had been considered and treated as "inattentive;" and justice demands that in future every "inattentive" child be examined with reference to its ears.—Vienna Neue Freie Presse.

HOUSEHOLD HELPS.

[From the Detroit Free Press "Household."]

AIR-SLACKED lime is an excellent polish for silver and tin ware.

ALWAYS flour your tins after greasing, before putting in cake. The cake will sleeve from the pans more readily.

TO ALWAYS insure light dumpling, mix and let stand two or three hours before rising; cut into thin strips, roll in flour and boil twenty minutes.

GOOD COOKIES WITHOUT EGGS.—One cup of very thick sour cream, one of sugar, one teaspoonful of soda, one of baking powder, a little salt and nutmeg; mix with as little flour as possible and bake in a quick oven.

GARMENTS to be ironed in cold starch should be immediately dipped into boiling water, and ironed as soon as starched. You will, in this way, have no trouble with flats sticking to the cloth. Another good way is to wet the starch with weak, cold suds made from white soap.

HAM SANDWICHES.—Chop the ham fine and season it with salt, pepper and mustard. If the lean meat alone is used a little butter may be added. Spread between thin slices of bread. Cheese sandwitches are very thin; the cheese may be grated or cut in thin slices. Mustard is added or not as pleased.

PET POUND CAKE.—Beat one pound of butter and one pound of sugar to a cream, whisk ten eggs to a high froth and add one and a half pounds of flour, one wineglassful of vanilla; beat all until light and creamy. Put into a tin pan with buttered paper and bake in a moderate oven one and a half hours.

SEA BREEZE CAKE.—Beat half a pound of butter to a cream. Take six eggs; beat the whites to a stiff froth and the yolks with one half pound powdered sugar and ten ounces of flour. Beat all well together; add a glass of brandy and one-quarter pound of citron cut into thin slices. Bake it in small tins in a quick oven for twenty minutes.

CREAM BISCUITS.—Delicious little cream biscuits for afternoon tea are made by mixing self-raising flour with cream, which roll into a thin, smooth paste, prick, cut and bake immediately. They should be kept dry in a close tin box. If the flour is not self-raising, salt it lightly, and mix with it a dessertspoonful of baking powder.

SNOWDON CAKE.—This is a genuine Scotch recipe, and is a great favorite with Scotch-American families. Beat to a cream half a pound of butter, three-quarters of a pound of granulated sugar, the whites of six eggs, half a teacup of cream, and one pound of Bermuda arrowroot. Add the beaten yokes of two of the eggs and a very little salt. Bake in a mold one hour or more.

STAFFORDSHIRE CAKE.—Beat one pound of butter to a cream with a teaspoonful of orange-flower water; then add one pound of powdered sugar, ten eggs beaten very light, and one and one-quarter pounds of flour; beat the cake well together, then add half a pound of sweet almonds beaten to a paste; butter some tin molds, line them with white paper; put in the mixture one and a half inches deep and bake in a quick oven one hour.

ELEANOR MACAROONS.—Pulverize one pound of sweet almonds quite fine with the whites of four eggs; add two and a half pounds of sugar and rub them well together; put in by degrees ten more whites, working them well as you put them in; put the mixture into a biscuit funnel and lay them out on wafer paper in pieces about the size of a walnut; put three or four pieces of almonds cut into thin slips on each, and bake them on a baking-plate in a slow oven one-half hour.

TEMPEST CAKE.—Beat one pound butter to a cream and mix with it the whites and yolks of eight eggs, beaten separately; have ready warm by the fire one pound flour one pound sugar; mix them with a few cloves, nutmeg and cinnamon, then gradually work the dry ingredients into the butter and eggs; when well beaten add a glass of wine and three-quarters of a pound of dried currants; beat well for one hour and put into a buttered tin and bake in a quick oven for one hour.

MASHED POTATOES.—Pare and boil the potatoes, and after every trace of the water has evaporated, mash them with your pestle, still in the kettle over the fire; they are naught if not kept hot. Get out every suggestion of a lump and as you mash put in a generous quantity of fresh butter, and, if you have it, some cream—if not cream, enough milk to make the potato rich and moist. Salt it to taste, and serve fresh and hot piled up and smoothed over in a hot dish with a little black pepper sifted on top. Mashed potatoes which has stood on the stove for a while before serving is poor stuff. If you want the top brown hold over it a salamander or a very hot stove lid—don't put the dish into the oven, that only makes the contents watery.

Visitress—"Thou appearest vexed, dear Emma." House Young Lady—"Oh, yes, think of it! Our girl has suddenly out of the service gone. Now must my old mother, with the rheumatism, the whole work do."

Gen. Hancock and his Servant.

Mr. Charles Brown, a resident of this city, at No. 262 Perry Street, at the commencement of the war was a slave in Falkill county, Va. He was pressed into the rebel service, but succeeded in escaping to the Union lines in October, 1862, and fell into the hands of General Hancock at Camp Griffin, Va. The General was so well pleased with him that he asked Mr. Brown to remain with him in the capacity of body-servant. He did so, and was with the General for nearly three years, passing through the great battles in which the General was engaged. When the war closed General Hancock wrote a personal letter to a friend in Washington recommending his old servant, first making him promise that whenever he should be out of a position he would let him know of it at once. Mr. Brown went to Washington, worked there for some time, and, becoming restless, came West, and after working for different people finally settled in Cleveland and began to follow his trade. Hearing that General Hancock was in the city, the guest of Colonel W. H Harris, Mr. Brown called upon him Sunday morning. He was informed by an aid that the General had gone to church. Mr. Brown stated that he was his servant during the war and expressed an earnest desire to see him. He was asked to take a seat and await the return from church. Soon a carriage drove up and the General alighted. The aid immediately informed him that his old servant who had been with him through the war was sitting on the lawn and desired to see him. General Hancock immediately proceeded to where Mr. Brown was seated, and, recognizing him long before he reached him, extended his hand and rushing up grasped the hand of his old servant, who had been with him during so many trying scenes, wrung it with every manifestation of delight, while tears filled the eyes of both and neither of them spoke for some time. At last the General had Mr. Brown sit down and made him relate every thing that the latter had done since the war, and again made him renew the old promise that if anything should happen to him he would inform the General, and that ample provision should be made for him.—Cleveland Herald.

The New Scientific American offices.

We are glad to announce that the Scientific American came out of the late fire in New York, like the fabled Phœnix, with renewed life. The subscription lists, account books, patent records, patent drawings, and correspondence were preserved in massive fire-proof safes. The printing of the Scientific American and supplement was done in another building; consequenty the types, plates, presses, paper, etc., were unharmed, and no interruption of business was occasioned.

The new Scientific American offices are located at 261 Broadway, corner of Warren Street, a very central and excellent situation. The new building fronts towards the City Hall, the Court House, and the new postoffice—a magnificent structure, which cost eight millions to build. Nearly opposite, and a few hundred feet distant from the Scientific American offices, is the great Suspension Bridge over East River, between New York and Brooklyn, which required ten years to construct and twenty millions of dollars to pay for. In front, also, of the Scientific American is the City Hall Park and Printing House Square, with its statue of Benjamin Franklin, and the homes of eminent editors and newspapers, such as the New York Tribune, New York Times, New York Sun, New York World, New York Herald, Mail and Express, Zeitung, and others.

The new Scientfic American offices are admirably chosen for active business. Here, in addition to the issuing of their interesting publication, Messrs. Munn & Co., aided by trained examiners and draughtsman, prepare specifications and drawings for American and Foreign patents. If any of our readers should happen to make a new discovery (we hope every one of them may do so, and gain a fortune), they have only to drop a line to Munn & Co., 261 Broadway, New York, who will reply at once, without charge, stating whether the invention is probably novel and patentable. A handbook of instructions, with full particulars, will also be sent, free. Messrs. Munn & Co. have had over thirty-five years experience in the business.

The Curfew Bell.

It will be remembered that the curfew is commonly said to have been introduced into England by William the Conqueror. By that monarch it was ordained, under severe penalties, that when the curfew bell rang at 8 o'clock in the evening all lights and fires should be extinguished. There are those who hold that this was merely the enforcing of an existing and very common police regulation to that effect. The absolute prohibition of lights after the ringing of the curfew bell was abolished by Henry I. in the year 1100, but the practice of tolling a bell at a fixed hour in the evening was continued, and this, wich is still extant in some places is a survival of the curfew of medievel times. At first the common hour was 7 o'clock, then it was gradually advanced to 8, and in some places to 9 o'clock: indeed, in Scotland, 10 o'clock was not an unusual hour. The curfew was a regulation most useful in those early days, when it was the custom to place the fire in a hole in the middle of the floor under an opening in the roof, to allow the escape of the smoke. When the family retired for the night, the fire was extinguished by covering it up; hence the term couvrefeu, or curfew. The regulation was also serviceable in obliging the people to keep in their houses, and thus preventing night brawl in the streets. It is believed that there is no historical authority for the popular tradition that the severity exhibited by the Conqueror in enforcing obedience to the curfew was more particularly designed to prevent the English from assembling in secret to plan schemes of rebellion against their Norman lords.

A pleasant birthday party was given at the residence of James Swisher, on Monday evening, Feb. 6th, in honor of the twenty first birth day of Henry Swisher. During the evening the guests were delighted with some fine music on the organ, by Miss Suda Hartle and Miss Laura Swisher. Henry was made the receiver of many presents, for which he returns thanks. He will start for Montana in a few days to seek his fortune, and may success go with him is the wish of his many friends. The party dispersed for their homes at a late hour, well pleased with the evening's fun. THE ÆTNA IS THE SAFEST, STRONGEST AND BEST POWDER
IN THE WORLD FOR REMOVING STUMPS AND STONES!
It is unnecessary to tell a farmer his land is more valuable without the stumps than with them. He knows that now. What he wants to know is the Best Quickest and Cheapest method of removing them, and that question we answer by saying, BLAST THEM OUT WITH ÆTNY POWDER. Any stump, large or small, green or decayed, can be thrown entirely out of the ground and broken into pieces small enough to handle.
If you have any stumps, send us your address and we will send you a man to do your work, or will sell you the powder and tools, so you can do it yourself Don't delay, but attend to it at once.

Our Exchanges.

Elkhart Monitor: A son of Mr. Moses Pullman, of Adamsville, shot and killed a valuable dog belonging to a young man named Kraus. The boy was tried, found guilty, and bound over to court under a bond of $400. A serious ending of the matter is probable.

Kendallville Standard: We received a letter yesterdap from C. O. Myers, of Chattanooga, Tenn. He says, among other things: "New growth of honeysuckles four or five inches high and roses about same. Lots of flowers out, and some garden made, but the roads are fearfully muddy.

Wabash Plain Dealer: A misplaced switch at Ft. Wayne, Monday night threw the express train due here at 10. 10 p. m. off the track causing a delay of over an hour. The run from Ft. Wayne to this place, forty-three miles, was made in sixty-eight minutes, including those stops.

Plain Dealer: While the Wallace-Villa brass band were coming down Wabash street, a team drawing a large load of wood became frightened and started to run away, up the hill. They turned toward the court house fence, and a lady and little girl narrowly escaped being run over by jumping off the sidewalk into the street.

Kendallville Standard: We don't believe in praising persons for doing good acts, but do wish to make public the many acts of benevolence to the churches and poor of our city, by Mrs. S. W. Fish. We speak of this by the solicitation of persons who have been relieved at her hands; perhaps she won't thank us for publishing this item, but we know of the many good acts accomplished by this lady. We wish Kendallville had more of the kind that "would do good and say nothing about it.

Elkhart Monitor: The C., W. & M. Ry. company has purchased forty acres of land on the old canal at Benton Harbor, for the purpose of building wharfage and thus insure close connection with lake vessels. The government is dredging the canal, and widening it from its original width of 60 feet to 100 feet. The railway has 150 hands at work building the wharfage, utilizing the dirt thrown out of the canal by the government employes.

Bluffton Banner: On last Monday about 11 o'clock, Mr. Franklin Beard, a young man of bright prospects committed suicide by cutting his throat from ear to ear. The jugular vein and main artery were severed. The young man was a bright scholar and always stood high in the community. There is something mysterious surrounding the matter. He had just returned home from Chicago, and it is supposed that his mind was somewhat unbalanced.

Fort Wayne News: This morning there registered at the Aveline House Hon. Calvin Cowgill, of Wabash, special agent to pay off the Miami tribe of Indians, and Mr. Gabriel Godfrey, or more properly Godfrey acts as interpreter, and a younger brother of the known Jim Godfrey, of Allen county, and the name of their father, the old war chief Godfrey, is found attached to the treaty made by the tribe, by which they accepted lands beyond the Mississippi and a few small reservations in Indiana, in lieu of their hunting grounds in the Wabash valley. A News reporter sought out those gentlemen this morning, and was given some facts of interest. Mr. Cowgill said to a News reporter that this payment was the principal due the Miamis by the treaty ratified by the U. S. Senate in the summer of 1854. An annual interest of five per cent. had been paid to the members of the tribe since then. At the time of the making of the roll in the hands of Mr. Cowgill, there were 318 decendants of this great tribe in the state, but one had just died. To each man, woman or child of the nation there falls a sum of $695.78. Where the person to receive this sum is not of age, guardians will receipt for the same after giving unincumbered free hold surety, in a sum three times as large as the amount received. There are about thirty Indians to be paid at Fort Wayne, and Mr. Cowgill hopes to finish by to-morrow, and leave for another point. The payments made here are by checks on the Hamilton National Bank. In Allen county the living members of the tribe are Jim Godfrey and wife and their immediate descendants. The Godfreys are of age. Two of the daughters are married their husbands being white. One is now Mrs. Chas. Stack, and the other Mrs. William Cass. Of the Indians who signed the treaty of 1854 but two are now living; Peter Bundy of Wabash county, who is married to a daughter of Mrs. Slocum, the famous white captive discovered by Hon. Washington Ewing, and Pimyotomah of Wabash county. After the money is paid by Mr. Cowgill, the Miamis lose their identity as a distinct nation, and cease to be pensioners on the government rolls.

THE DECEDENT'S ESTATE ACT.

An Outrage Upon the People of Indiana.

THE WORK OF THE LAST SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE.

[Huntington Democrat.]

At the time the sweeping change was made in the decedent's estate law, we did not hesitate to condemn the law as expensive and burdensome to the people. Of these things, and after having an opportunity of inspecting the workings of the law, we have had no reason to change our minds, but again reiterate all we said, and solemnly say to our readers that not half was told. The law cannot be regarded in any other light than an outrage upon the widows and orphans of Indiana, and we so declare it, and invite any friend to the law to come forward and tell us wherein we misrepresent the facts. In the the first place, the law requires a change in books, blanks, etc., in every county in the state, and in Huntington county alone it costs the tax-payers from three to five hundred dollars in actual cash to procure books and blanks to put in operation the requirements of the law. As to how it works in the matter of settling estates, we will say there is not a statute in any state of the Union, so far as we have examined, that is more outrageous than the "Decedent's Estate Act" of Indiana. Under this infamous law (for we can call it by no other name) the widow, although she may become the administratrix of her husband's estate, yet she dare not settle any claim, even those that occur in her husband's last sickness, without first having the claim filed in court, and there docketed. To establish this claim it requires proof to the satisfaction of the court, or the statement of the poor widow that the claims are just, in which event the court will allow the claim. Although the claim is known to be just and owing from the start, yet the estate is required to go through the expense of the court and pay the costs of all this red tape, which is nothing more and nothing less than robbing the widow and orphans of the little pittance, perchance, there may be left them on the death of husband and father. To show still more pointedly how this "Decedent's Estate Act" works, suppose some man in Salamonie township was employed to dig the grave or attend and care for the dying man and the bill should be one dollar. This bill cannot be paid out of the estate, under the law, by the widow or administrator, but must be filed and docketed and the claim must be allowed by the court, making an expense upon the estate of at least half of the claim, besides that entailed upon the poor laborer in attending court or employing a lawyer to attend to it for him. We might go further into this law to show its workings by saying that the county clerk is required to give two weeks notice in some newspaper printed in the county every time a report is filed, (which is required every six months,) giving notice of the fact. Here is another expense of from three to four dollars to every estate every six months that is outrageous and of no use whatever to anyone except those who do the work. To state the case plainly, the title of act should be changed from the "Decedent's Estate Act" to that of "Benefit Act for Master Commisioners, County Clerks, Sheriffs and Printers." This is our opinion, plainly and unhesitatingly stated, and we care not who may except to our proposition, and we say furthur, that no man can defend the workings of the infamous law, in justice to the widows, orphans and claimants.

I am very glad to say I have tried Hop Bitters, and never took anything that did me as much good. I only took two bottles and I would not take $100 for the good they did me. I recommend them to my patients, and get the best results from their use.

Communication.

CLAY CENTER, KANSAS, Feb. 24, 1882.

FRIEND JAMES: I will write you a few lines from our new home in the west. We reached Clay Center on the second day of this month, and found our goods here, had them hauled up to our farm and unloaded in what is called a door yard—that is as large as the farm. We found our house in bad shape, as the man who lived on the farm keeps "bach." Things looked rather discouraging, but by the use of the whitewash brush, broom and mop, things looked some better. We have to economize room, and while we stay, will have to put up with Kansas life till we can build an addition to our house. Our farm is well located, and is within about 90 rods of the corporation line of Clay Center. Can see about one-third of the town from our house. Clay Center is quite a business place, of about 3,000 inhabitants, and does a large trade. There are fifteen stores that sell dry goods, and about the same number of groceries, four hardware stores, four drug stores and four or five hotels. One which was finished since I came here cost $13,000. It is a brick three stories high and said to be first-class. There are several agricultural stores. There is one, Shultz Bros., that has more farm machinery than all the houses of the same kind in Auburn. Two good mills; one steam and the other water power. The water mill has been running day and night for the last four months, and runs from four to five run of buhrs. The steam mill runs from six in the morning till from six to nine at night, and runs three and four buhrs. The city is building a fine school-house, and when completed, will be a good building, and will cost about $25,000. It stands on a rising piece of land, and makes a fine show to the south and west. Main street runs north and south. The school-house is south of our place and a few rods west, one-half mile away, and almost at the east line of corporation. I think my property is going to make me some money, being close to town and good land. All it wants is to fix it in good shape, and it will sell well. Property in town is way high. There was a corner lot on Main street sold last week, 24x140 feet, for $1,700. Six business rooms will be built this spring. The cellar walls of three in one block are about completed. There are a number of other buildings going up, but I don't know what they are to be. There are are three banks, all exchange.

We have had the finest weather I ever saw, for winter. Roads good as we have in Indiana in summer. The wind changed to the north Thursday morning, and yesterday it was cold enough to put on an overcoat for the first time since we came. It sleeted a little last night and to-day the wind is in the southeast, and is trying to rain.

Wheat looks well. I have not been over the country but little yet. John is going to school. We are in usual health. Yours,

It is also reported that Nas was shot by Garcia Calderon's trroops.

SERIOUS disturbances may soon be expected in Burmah. The King's recent illness was delirium tremens, and it was felt that his life was hardly worth a day's purchase. Should he die, there is certain to be a struggle for the throne, and even if he lives, an explosion of madness may occur at any time. Constant intrigues are reported. There are few English residents at Mandalay, but a considerable number of foreigners, chiefly Italians and French. Every man carries his life in his hand.

THE Rev. Father Scully, of Cambridge, Mass., is a severe condemner of church fairs. "They demoralize our girls," he says, "more than do our lowest theaters, for girls, armed with their church fair book, go forth under religious and parental sanction where they please and when they please, entering even bar-rooms to solicit chances and votes. The children think of nothing but the fair. Home, church, and school are banished. When lager beer is sold in our churches where fairs are held, how can we train our youth to look with horror on the evils of rum?"

THE contest of the native with the foreign merchants for the control of the Japanese silk market continues. They will have to look forward to a time, not for distant if capital lasts, when the Janpese and the Chinese, too, will themselves send the greater part of their exports to fel-

MANY people find that the charms of music are much enhanced if combined with tobacco and beer. Recently an amateur concert of this variety hall sort was given by British swells in London, the orchestra being eighty aristocrats, with a clergyman, perhaps an expert pulpit pounder, as the drummer, and the Duke of Edingburgh as first violin. The audience and the performers smoked and drank their fill, and the concert was pronounced highly enjoyable. Thus the humble beer garden has upper society sanction for tickling the nostrils and palates of its patrons while appealing to their ears.

THE most gigantic matrimonial scheme ever devised is the English Woman's Emigration Society. The ladies of England, unwilling that their sisters should forever be unprovided with homes of their own, propose to send them where husbands are more easily captured than in the land of the rose. With this in view agencies for, disposing of the lorn English maidens have been established in Australia, Canada, South Africa and Iowa. It is stated that the bachelors of Queensland have offered to furnish free transportation for two hundred "comely women under 30" a month, but what inducements Iowa bachelors offer is not made public.

THE revolver, according to a London paper, is in all probability destined to be shortly discarded from use in the army, navy, Irish constabulary, and other government services in favor of a new weapon, the mitrailleuse pistol, in which there are four barrels, which are loaded at once by a patent quadruple cartridge big enough to afford good hold to the fingers. Forty shots per minute can be discharged, and the empty cartridges ejected automatically. As there is no opening through which any gas can escape, the weapon can be used gun fashion when aiming, and there are no screws, hammers, or projections to catch the clothing, reins, or accoutrements. Above all, there is no fear of a jam or the weapon becoming unserviceable from over heating. The pistol will take the ordinary Government cartridge.

A CHICAGO newspaper reporter has been investigating the sewing girl question, and discovers that the shirt makers receive from eight to twenty-five cents for each shirt made. A dress-maker stated that she was paid from 75 cents to $1 per day. The car fare cost her sixty cents per week. She paid $1.50 per week for her room. When anything was done wrong it must done over again. Any accidental damage to machines was charged to them. From talks with a number it was gathered that a girl who was alone in the world, and dependent upon her needle for support, was pretty badly off, but with those who had homes, and which form the large majority, it is not so bad. It is in the latter class that the sealskin caps and nobby cloaks are worn, with mayhap a flash of jewelry. The girls are moving in the matter of establishing a union, hoping thereby to better their condition. They do not seem to have considered the better plan of co-operation.

FROM THE WIRES.

A Reproduction of Important Telegraphic Dispatches—Records of Fires, Crimes, Horrors, and Interesting Events.

A Cincinnati dispatch says:

A heavy rain has been falling al morning. The river at 11 o'clock is fifty-five feet above low-water mark, and rising two inches an hour. All the cellars below Third street are flooded, practically suspending business in that part of the city. A great force is kept busy removing goods. The Plum street passenger depot is inaccessible, and trains deliver passingers at Wood street. Maddux & Hobart's distillery and the Globe Rolling Mill have been compelled to close operations. The former has driven away all its stock. Other distilleries in the same locality will be compelled to close to-day. If the rain should stop now, it is estimated there will be, five feet more of a rise. What will come with more rain would make the highest water ever known.

The six large columns of the old State Bank building of Nashville Tenn., which is now being torn down, will be used for a monument to the Confederate dead. The monument will be erected in Mount Olive Cemetry. Another national bank will soon be started here, with a capital $200,000. Robert McIuley, sentenced to be hanged in the jail yard March 31, appealed to the Supreme Court. He was a convict in the Penitentary and murdered a fellow-convict named James R. McM'llan last Sepetember.

A St. Louis dispatch says:

Rain has fallen pretty steadily and heavily here since Saturday morning, measuring nearly six inches, and has done considerable damage. All trains were from four to eight hours late in arriving this morning. Several trains which left this morning were abandoned and obliged to return. At Lane Cliff, on the Iron Mountain road, there is an extensive washout, and two passenger trains that left the Union depot last night were obliged to lay over all night at Carondelet, and are still there.

The scaffolding erected for the use of the workmen, while repairing the St. Charles Bridge, on the Wabash road, was washed away by the sudden rise in the Mississippi river, and the country around is much flooded by the heavy rain, and the track of the Wabash, St. Souis and Pacific, between here and St. Peters, is flooded.

A fire in the Albion Print Works, on Water street, Philadelphia, destroyed the entire stock, worth $50,000, and the stocks of several other firms in the same building. Total loss, $150,000. The charred body of an unknown man was found on the second floor when the fire was subdued. A number of other persons are missing.

The east wing of the Kings County, New York, Insane Asylum, at Flatbush, burned the 21st. One patient was lost. He was a paralytic, and would scarcely have lived the day out. Loss, $15,000 Two or three inmates escaped from custody.

Advices from Panama state that Trescott seems to have made up his mind to remain in Chili, having rented a house there for six months. James G. Allison, convicted of murdering his father at Indiana Pa., suffered the penalty of death by hangin at 11 o'clock. The prisoner arose at 6 this morning, having slept four hours. He ate a hearty breakfast, but preserved a stolid silence. At 10 o'clock his mother, sister and brother called but he positively refused to see them, and when they came into his cell would not recognize them. He also refused to be shaved, and would not allow the Sheriff to dress him in a new suit. At 11 o'clock exactly the trap was sprung, and the prisoner was launched into eternity. the only words he spoke were, I have been fetched here wrong." The body was allowed to hang until 11:30, when it was cut down and life pronounced extinct. No excitement prevailed. No one witnessed the execution excepting the officers of the law and newspaper men. The crime for which young Allison suffered was committed on the evening of June 18, 1880. Neighbors living in the vicinity of Allison's residence heard the report of the several pistol shots, and hurrying out to ascertain the cause found old Mr. Allison lying on the ground with four in his body. He died three days after, and before death said his son James had murdered him. James was arrested, tried and convicted, the evidence being strong against him, and showing that a bad feeling had existed among the members of the Allison family for a long time on account of the father's dissolute habits.

A Chester, Pa., dispatch says:

About 8 o'clock an explosion occurred at the pyrotechnic works of Professor Jackson, in this city. The building was badly shattered, and took fire, and was consumed. At least fifteen, and probably more, lives are lost, and many dangerously wounded. The building was the old homestead of Admiral Porter.

9:40 a. m.—A number of colored families lived in the old Porter mansion. It seems that, when it first took fire, and while the firemen were playing on the flames, and a large crowd surrounded them, an explosion occurred, scattering destruction far and wide. The number of killed is between fifteen and twenty. About twenty are dangerously and fifty more or less seriously wounded. The dead are being laid out in the City Hall, and the wounded are cared for in the various drug stores, so that no accurate list can be obtained now.

The following is a list of the killed: John Lamptugh, Thomas Dollison, Thomas Anderson, Alexander Philips, John Pollick, Joseph Kestner, Geo. Taylor, James Dougherty, Benjamin Gartside (colored) Anthony Barber, William Wood, John Daiers, Edward Stropschire. All the killed lived here.

1:30 p. m.—Fifty persons were more or less wounded, three fatally.

Part of the mansion had been used by Professor Jackson, a Pyrotechnist, for some years as a place of manufacturing explosive commodities. The firemen, after being assured that there were no explosives in the place went to work. After playing on the flames about half an hour a terrific explosion occurred. The bodies of the victims were thrown in every direction, the air was filled with rubbish, and the ground covered with mangled forms—some killed, some seriously injured, and others badly hurt. The dead bodies of the men lay coiled on the ground, others lay in the agonies of death, and a number, writhing in their blood, moaned and groaned piteously for help. Many lay insensible their surroundings, and others, bruised and bleeding, groped their way from the scene of the terrible accident.

The scene beggars description. The fire was abandoned, and everybody in condition to do so turned attention to alleviating the distress. The houses n the vicinity of the explosion were converted into hospitals, and the wounded removed thereto.

A Boston dispatch says:

Midnight—A fire broke out at Haverhill, Mass., at 11:45 and is now burning fiercely. The authorities have telegraphed for assistance to Lawrence, Newburyport, Lowell and other towns adjacent.

Haverhill was settled 242 years ago, and contains 15,000 inhabitants. It lies on the north bank of the Merrimack river, at the head of navigation, fifteen miles from the ocean, on the Boston and Maine Railroad, thirty-three miles north of Boston. It has from twenty to thirty churches, and a fine city hall. It is a great manufacturing town.

Haverhill, Mass., February 18.—The fire is under control. But one block remains on Wingate street and two at the upper end of Washington street. All else in the square bounded by the Merrimack river on the south, Washington Square and Essex street on the east, the north side of Wingate street on the north, and Railroad Square on the west, burned to the ground. This territory embraces the largest part of the boot and shoe manufactories.

Joseph Pratt, a fireman, was killed, and George Whittier was fatally injured.

What yesterday was the finest street in the city and the principal business mart, is to-day a smoldering mass of ruins. Some eighty shoe firms have been entirely burned out, and others suffered more or less damage. Two thousand people are thrown out of employment. Several families are homeless.

The loss is estimated at $2,500,000.

Engines are present from Newburyport, Lawrence and Lowell,

Men are already at work clearing away the debris.

Ober & Blake's and the Gardner block, on the north side of Wingate street, were several times on fire, but were saved.

The wind blew fresh from the northwest, which, with a scarcity of water, and the freezing of the hose, made it difficult to control the fire.

Several persons are reported to be missing, but nothing definite is known yet.

The Journal says the insurance men believe the loss by the Haverhill fire will fall almost entirely upon the insurance companies. The net loss to the firms will not exceed a quarter of a million.

In the Circuit Court of Milwaukee the Northern Transit Company has begun suit against the Grand Trunk Railway for damages at $500,000, upon breaches of contract. The Grand Trunk contracted with the Transportion Company to form its eastern connection, and it is alleged by the latter that the railway did not fulfill the contract by furnishing the requisite number of cars.

A dispatch from Battleford, Northwestern Territory, says the Blackfeet and other Indians in the vicinity of Forts Red Deer and South Branch are committing numerous depredations, and driving off and killing cattle. In the Bow River country several American whisky traders were killed by them, and several other Americans have been found dead in the neighborhood, are and supposed to have been killed by the same savages.

THE STORM.

GUARDING THE LOWER MISSISSIPPI.

Memphis, Tenn., February 22.—The officers of the steamer City of Greenville confirm the report published of the sad condition of affairs now existing throughout the Mississippi valley. Thousands of men are on constant guard along the levees between here and Vicksburg, using every possible means to strengthen their power of resistance and elevate their crests and prevent the water from inundating the whole country. The Greenville brought up several thousand empty sacks, to be used by filling with earth, to aid in strengthening embankments. A batch of 3,000 were put off at Bolivar Landing, where the danger of a break was imminent.

Washington, Issaquena, Bolivar, Coahoma, and Tunica counties, Miss., in fact, the whole shore line between Memphis and Vicksburg, on the Mississippi side, and the whole eastern shore of Arkansas are either under water or threatened with inundation. The inhabitants of a vast area of country are in great distress. Many have been forced from their houses, and are subsisting as best they may on rafts, and some on knolls or parts of old levees. The destruction of live stock is beyond calculation.

The navigation of the river itself is regarded by steamboat men as dangerous at its present stage, on account of the great expanse of water in many localities and the billowy character of the waves when the surface is swept by heavy gusts of wind, and also because of the great difficulty of getting to a safe port, The Government lights along the river are maintained with admirable regularity. These lights prove of incalculable benefit to steamboat men now, since all landmarks have disappeared.

Arkansas City is completely submerged. Not a single house in the city is free from the presence of the muddy flood. The water there is represented as being eight inches higher than the flood of 1876. The houses were built so as to be above the high flood level of that year, but in all of them there is from seven to eight inches of water.

Between Cairo and Memphis the following points of land only are visible above the surging flood: The bluffs at Columbus Hills, back of Hickman, the land on the Tennessee side opposite Island Ten; New Madrid, Point Pleasant, Tiptonville, Fulton Bluffs, Randolph, Richardson's, Islands Thirty-five and Thirty-six, and Dean's Island, above the head of the Centennial cut-off, forty miles above Memphis.

AT CINCINNATI.

Cincinnati, O., February 22.—The river has fallen nearly two feet from the highest mark, and is falling rapidly. The weather is clear and cold.

Advices from up the river show that the river is still rising, and it may rise again here, but the cold weather gives promise that the worst is over. There is no change in the general situation here.

AT JACKSONVILLE, ILL.

Jacksonville, Ill., February 22.—This city has had no connection with St. Louis for two days on account of the freshet. Yesterday no trains arrived from the East over the Wabash, and this morning a bad break on the Chicago and Alton road near Petersburg has cut us off in a third direction. Superintendent Bates promises the restoration of the St. Louis connection to-day. The weather was severely cold last night.

AT ST. LOUIS.

St. Louis, February 22.—The effects of the snow storm are fast disappearing, and the railroads are rapidly getting into good order again. All the tracks are not yet fully repaired, but enough of them are repaired to enable all the trains to move by the companies using each other's roads for short distances, except the Louisville and Nashville, whose track is still impassable at Silver Creek, some thirty miles from here. The Missouri Pacific sent out a train this morning over the St. Louis and San Francisco track to Springfield, Missouri, and thence to Kansas City, but will have its own road in order by to-morrow perhaps. The Wabash east will use the Chicago and Alton road to a point beyond the obstruction on its own track, and the Vandalia will continue to use the Ohio and Mississippi till its own repairs are completed. The river came to a stand this morning, and is now falling slowly. It is expected to go down with a rush, which will measurably relieve the pressure on the Mississippi below Cairo. The weather has moderated a good deal, and thawing has commenced.

Indianapolis, Ind., February 22.

The Greenback State Convention met at Indianapolis, with 200 delegates. Committees were appointed and a speech made by Colonel Jesse Harper. General Weaver came upon the platform, and was heartily cheered. Considerable enthusiasm prevailed. Two reports on temperance will be presented, the majority in the favor of the constitutional amendments, and the minority opposing.

All trains are behind time, on account of the high water. Bridges have been washed away in all directions.

FOR NERVOUS DEBILITY

BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoroughly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by

Indiana, April 11, '79.—The Remedy is working perfectly. Had epilepsy from weakness, for 8 years past.

Iowa, Oct. 10th, '79.—I am almost surprised at your Pastilles. They have worked like a charm on me. I am just twice as much of a man as I was before taking. I was on the verge of the grave, I thought, and there was no cure for me, but now I am in good hopes for a cure.

West Virginia, Aug. 28, 1879.—I received your medicine and I believe it has cured me, for which I am very thankful. Inclosed find $5. Please send me another box [No. 2] for a friend. You have done a great thing for me. I will send you all the orders I can.

From a Physician and Surgeon.

Missouri, June 21.—Please forward me another box of the Pastilles. The patient on whom I have used most of one box, in addition to a sample box, is fast recovering, and I think another will set him all right.

From a Druggist.

Maryland, Sept. 2, '79.—Last January we got a box of your Remedy for one of our customers, and it has made a perfect cure of him. We have another customer now suffering in the same way and wish one No. 3 box.

You get an entire meal, as good as is served in any first-class hotel, for seventy-five cents.

Appreciating the fact that a majority of the people prefer separate apartments for different purposes (and the immense passenger business of this line warranting it), we are pleased to announce that this Company runs Pullman Palace Sleeping Cars for sleeping purposes, and Palace Dining Cars for eating purposes only. One other great feature of our Palace Cars is a SMOKING SALOON where you can enjoy your "Havana" at all hours of the day.

Magnificent Iron Bridges span the Mississippi and Missouri rivers at all points crossed by this line, and transfers are avoided at Council Bluffs, Kansas City, Leavenworth, and Atchison, connections being made in Union Depots.

Baldwin's Fees.

The Warsaw union in a recent number called attention to the matter of Attorney General Baldwin's fees. As the article is of general interest, we quote it entire: "The Indianapolis evening News, an independent Republican paper, charges that the present Republican Attorney General of this state, Hon. D. P. Baldwin, is making an outrageous profit out of his office, on account of the law, which allows many opportunities for fee grabbing. He is allowed by the law $2,500 a year, with $600 for deputy hire and $10 in each case in which he appears for the state, besides a per cent. on all collections made. It is the last item that makes his profits. He has lynxeyed deputies in every county in the state, who are constantly on the look out for omissions and derelictions of county officers. For instance, very frequently county clerks neglect to pay over to the treasurers in the proper time, judgments which go to the credit of the school fund. When notified of this by the deputy the money is of course promptly paid, and the Attorney General gets 20 per cent. for the alleged collection. Likewise when justices of the peace neglect to settle in time, and the cases are numerous, the money goes to the state instead of the county, and the Attorney General gets another large fee. The worst feature of the whole business, however, is the loss of the county fund. For instance: Marion county has paid to him since the first of January, 1881, in two instances, over $1,000. The State Treasurer has no record of this collection and connot have, under the present interpretation of the law, until the Attorney General's term of office has expired. The money properly belongs to the general school fund, and should be expended for the schools. Attorney General Baldwin has the principal, and presumably is getting interest on it. What is true of Marion county must be true of other counties throughout the State. The collections are going on continually, and in counties like Marion, Allen Wayne, Tippecanoe, St. Joseph, La. Porte, Vanderburg, Clark, Knox, and a score of others that might be named, the aggregate by this time must reach a large sum. Some estimates place it as high as $3,000 now in the hands of the Attorney General. On this amount he gets his 6 per cent., amounting to $5,000, and interest on the rest, paying of course something to deputies for hunting out the cases. It is thought that Judge Baldwin in this manner is making at least $15, 000 a year out of his office, and, while probably there is strictly no illegality in his scheme, it was clearly a thing not anticipated when the law was passed.

THE apportionment bill as it now stands will give the new house of representatives 325 members. Indiana will if the bill becomes a law, have the same number of members in the the new house as she had in the old. This will increase the electoral vote to 401, and if Dakota is admitted to 404. Between the sections the electoral vote will be divided as follows: Twenty Northern States, 197; sixteen Southern States, 153; New York, and Indiana, 51; total, 401; necessary to a choice, 201. New York will have 34 members, Pennslyvania 28, Ohio 21, and Illinois 20—each one more than present. The States that gain the largest number of new members are- Texas 5, Kansas 4, Minnesota, Iowa, California, Michigan, Nebraska, and South Carolina 2 each. The states to lose are Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WATERLOO.

The wires are all up once more on the Lake Shore road, and communication goes on as usual.

In spite of the bad roads this winter, the Lake Shore has managed to get in a few ties. Several hundred are now piled up on their ground near the crossing.

A. M. Jones, of Syracuse, was up here one day last week to see about the sale of his property on the north side.

Mrs. Robert Patterson is so much improved in health as to be around at work once more.

W. H. Leas and J. R. Duncan attended the Grand Lodge of Knights of Honor.

Geo. Shoner went to Auburn the first of the week to look up his interests in the criminal cases now on the docket, in regard to the hides he lost last winter.

C. M. Phillips was at the county seat this week. Court business.

James Booths' child died this week, and was buried Wednesday afternoon in the cemetery. We did not learn the particulars.

Esquire Walker, of Smithfield, was at the Ann Eliza Young lecture.

J. D. McAnally has built an addition to his already comfortable house.

W. B. Maxwell was home over night Tuesday.

The lecture of Mrs. Ann Eliza Young, the nineteenth wife of Brigham Young, was well attended. The lecture was well prepared and well delivered. She is a forcible and brilliant speaker, and handles the polygamous saints without gloves, and without mercy. Her exposition of the weak and cowardly manner in which our government has always dealt with the Mormons was especially good, as well as truthful. It is just such speeches as the one Mrs. Young delivered, that are needed to strengthen the backbone of congressmen and others in authority. When this can be done, they will be able to deal with this question a little more vigorously.

Mrs. Thomas Kelley and daughter came over from Syracuse last Thursday.

Miss Lillie Spencer went down to Ft. Wayne last Thursday to hear Hamlet played.

C. P. Urie, of Corunna, was in town Monday

O. H. Widney is now one of the city dads.

M. E. Olds has purchased a quarter interest in the mule which George Bieaks owned. Mort. will soon have to provide his share of the provender.

A brother of Geo. Barney from Cleveland, Ohio, is visiting with the family of Sol. Barney.

One of the Newville boys was around last Friday hunting up the correspondent of the Hicksville News. Perhaps it was better he did not find him. Don't think he was here, Joe.

Wm. Leighty was in Butler Saturday last.

O. H. Widney, Sol. Barney, W. K. Mitchell, Curtis Washler and Geo. W. Woodcox paid a visit to the superior court of Allen county last week.

Sol. B. took in the Booth entertainment while in Fort Wayne. S. I. is one of those timid kind and took his seat near one of the doors, so as to make his exit quick in case of an accident. While the play was progressing, the fire bell commenced to toll. We were sure Sol. would fly, so anxious was he to get out of doors. His fears were soon quieted, however, and he still survives.

C. K. Baxter, of the Waterloo Press, was one of the crowd who attended the Booth show at Ft. Wayne.

O. H. W. examined the relics of that old-timer, Peter Kiser, on his recent visit to Ft. Wayne. He saw the George Washington hatchet among the rest.

We understand that two of our promising young men boarded the cars one evening last week for Hicksville. By some means a quarrel was risen between the conductor and one of the two boys. A foul name was applied to the conductor which was resented by the said conductor. One of the foresaid boys got several hard knocks from which no doubt he will recover. Whiskey did it.

Miss Jennie McIntyre and Brooks Hine attended the examination last Saturday.

The recent rains and freezing destroyed a large number of fruit trees. It also committed sad havock with the telegraph wires. A number of the poles were blown down.

The smallpox scare has reached Sedan. The doctor has vaccinated quite a number since they heard of the case at Auburn.

The red ribbon club elected new officers last Saturday night: L. W. Treesh, president; Henry Freetz, H. Getts and Mrs. Hine, vice-presidents; J. W. Bateman, secretary; Mrs. N. Chaney, treasurer; Mrs. McIntyre, Mrs. Grate and Mrs. Hine, financial committee.

Schools are coming to a close, and every family should have their children well vaccinated before they close.

Soon time to see who will be candidates for township offices this spring.

Call and be vaccinated before spring work begins.

Mrs. Harriet Reaves and her daughter Ellen announced a birthday party to be at their house Monday evening last, as their birthdays came on the same day of the month. Many of their friends and neighbors called on them to enjoy with them a pleasant evening. Many presents were given, festivities were served, and a good time in general was had. And not until a late hour did they bid adieu.

Some Egg.

J. A. McClure, of Keyser township, left at this office last week a rather remarkable specimen of what a hen can do when left to her own sweet will. It is a monster egg, that measures 8½ inches around the largest way, and 6 inches around the short way. Its lenght is 3½ inches. What is also remarkable is, that McClure's hen don't seem at all stuck up by her achievement, but allows her chickens to play with the other "chicks" just as she always did in the days of her poverty, when she couldn't afford any better eggs than her neighbors.

Farmers' Institute.

A series of farmers' meetings will be held this year, under the auspices of the State Board of Agriculture. The first one will be at Columbus, in Bartholomew county, March 8 and 9. H. C. Meredith, of Wayne county, is president, and Alex Heron, secretary of the State Board, is secretary. The exercises will be addresses, lectures and discussions. The meeting promises to be an interesting one. We hope to see our part of the state represented.

9-2w. Dr. C. S. Sears.

—C. Beugnot took a trip a few days ago into northern Wisconsin, returning last week. He brings back news of a fine fall of snow in that region, makin first-class sleighing. To talk of good roads this winter, makes one almost wish the hard winter of a year ago were still running.

—W. H. Kiblinger is putting up a building on Seventh street, between Hoff's fruit house and Hyler's shoe shop, for use in storing agricultural implements the coming season. This part of his business will be in charge of Mr. Myers, formerly of the firm of Myers & Brooks. And they will make things lively the coming season.

—Orlando Kimmel, one of the leading republicans of Noble county, has been tried for bribing voters on election day. It appears by the evidence brought out at the trial, that he paid a Mr. Spangle $50.00 to vote the republican ticket. We hope to see such men as Kimmel punished to the full extent of the law. A few examples of this kind would do the politics of the country a great benefit.

—I desire to inform all those who wish to purchase a buggy, that I have the largest and best assortment in this part of the state, and at prices to suit the times. I will not be undersold by any one. Charles Eckhart, 9-2t Prop. Eckhart Carriage Works.

—A. M. Jones, of Syracuse, made the Courier folks a friendly visit last week. He was on his way to Waterloo, on business. Mr. Jones expects to have his new place on Syracuse Lake running next summer. This will add to the accomodations of this pleasure resort. Syracuse and vicinity are bound to become the most popular resort in Indiana, and Mr. Jones, is doing his share to make it so.

—Capt. Louis Ochs, of Meridian, Miss., is visiting his brothers, Messrs. Simon and Isaac Ochs, this week. Mr. Ochs was in the Confederate service during the rebellion, and was captain in the Washington Artillery, which took part in so much of the hard fighting about Richmond. He was in both Bull Run battles, and experienced the vicissitudes of a soldier's fortune, having been severely wounded and taken prisoner.

—Messrs. Lord & Thomas, of Chicago, the special advertising agents for this paper, and doing a general business with a large number of other publishers, are thorough, practical, pushing men, and do a very large business satisfactory to themselves and to their customers throughout the United States. We speak a good word for this firm because we know they are reliable, honest and in every way competent to conduct an advertising agency.

Smallpox.

Lester Helms, a son of Mr. Helms who keeps a boarding house on Main street was taken sick last week, and on Thursday it was pronounced a clear case of smallpox. The family and boarders were at once ordered to remain in the house and not to leave the premises. A card was fastened up to one corner of the house, and subsequently a large red flag was added, both displaying the warning word, "Smallpox." On Saturday night, the sick boy was moved to a building in the north part of town, his father and mother accompanying him. They will remain with him until his convalescence. This building is quite a distance from any other dwellings; it is as safe from any contact with the outside world as if it were in the midst of an uncultivated field. Our citizens, though a little alarmed at the first announcement, have now quietly settled down to business, and everything moves on as before. No danger of a further spread of the disease is apprehended. Everything that can be done to assist the afflicted family is being attended to. The boarders at the boarding house will be kept in quarantine a week or two longer, until the authorties feel safe in releasing them. They will be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected before they can leave the place. After removing the boy, the house, both outside and inside, was disinfected. Every precaution possible is being taken to prevent any escape of the disease in any way. The boy is getting along well. It is not known how or where he contracted the disease. It is claimed that he has at times been away from home of late, and it is supposed he was exposed either at Ft. Wayne or North Manchester.

—J. J. Martin, so long and favorably known to our people as the accommodating and reliable agent of the B. & O. road at the Junction, left the company's service this week on Tuesday, and is succeeded by his former assistant, Geo. C. Sheffer. Mr. Martin has held this important station so long that our people had begun to consider his connection with the road almost a part of the system itself. He will be greatly missed. No employe of the road between Chicago Junction, Ohio, and Chicago, has (as far as we are able to learn) held a position on the road as long as Mr. Martin. And even now he has not been removed, but resigned to enter mercantile life at Albion, where he goes to establish a hardware store this week. His family will remain here in his home at the Junction until he can find a suitable place for them in Albion. The citizens of Albion will by this change gain a very desirable and reliable citizen, and we bespeak for him a hearty welcome and a generous share of the business patronage of that vicinity, and hope he may be as prosperous and as popular as he was here.

—For the benefit of pupils and our public schools and the convenience of parents, I am arranging with physicians in different parts of the county to visit schools during the last week of their sessions, so that scholars who have been successfully vaccinated heretofore can be supplied with certificates, and that those not yet vaccinated can have the opportunity to comply with the law, and thus prepared to legally enter the public schools at their future sessions. The extra effort made by the County Board to extend the time of vaccination to the close of the schools, should certainly be appreciated, and now all should do what they can to comply with the law, and thus assist the Health Bureau in this county in their good and important work. Teachers will please see to it that a record of the vaccination certificates is kept in the district, and that the certificates themselves are placed in the hands of their township trustees, where they will be placed on file, so that scholars removing to other parts of the state can get their certificates to take with them. Township trustees will please keep such account of said certificates that they may be able to make a report to this office on blanks which will be furnished them in due time for that purpose.

—The social at the Presbyterian church last Wednesday evening was well attended in spite of the unfavorable weather. The net receipts were about $17.00. The ladies of the congregation are showing most praiseworthy energy and business tact in their endeavors to pay off the remaining debt of the church. May their labors be crowned with success. If a man's opinion is worth anything in matters of this kind, we might suggest that they set too good a table for ten cents.

Fatal Accident.

Solomon Simon, a prominent farmer living in the southwest part of Butler township, was killed on Monday by the falling of a tree. He was cutting down timber in company with his brother-in-law, Frank Smith, on the land of the latter. When the tree began to fall a large slab split from it, and the two men, dropping the saw, ran in different directions and stopped at what they thought a safe distance. The slab, however, flew in the direction in which Mr. Simon stood, and struck a dead stub, knocking it suddenly over. It struck Mr. Simon in falling and killed him instantly, although it did not fall upon him. Smith ran up and found him senseless, with the blood gushing from both his ears. His death was probably instantaneous. The coroner was summoned and the facts as above stated brought out. Mr. Simon was a man largely known and greatly respected. He leaves a wife and one daughter, a young lady, to mourn his untimely death. They have the sympathy of the entire community. He was buried yesterday.

CORONER'S INQUEST.

I, J. J. Latson, coroner of DeKalb county, state of Indiana, and legally authorized to enquire into and in what manner and by whom Solomon Simon came to his death, after having heard all the testimony, and examined the body, I do find that deceased came to his death by the falling of a tree, striking him on the side of the head and shoulder, causing instant death.

Given under my hand and seal, this 28th day of February, 1882.

{ SEAL. } J. J. Latson,
Coroner.

Curious Carvings.

Isaac Farver, of Jackson township, showed us this week the finest specimens of carved wood we have ever seen. They are work of his own hands, and consist of three wooden towers. One has three stories, each supported by eight columns, and between these colums lie five balls. Above the third story, are five other stories, each containing a single ball. Another has five balls on the first floor, with seven single ones on as many stories above, and pendant from the top, hang four beautiful chains. The third tower is less elaborate but is still wonderful. A fine carved chain is also of the lot. All are carved in nice white basswood, and show an amount of skill and patience that are remarkable. They are works of which Mr. Farver, may well feel proud.

A Boss Well.—Billy Showalters and Arnold, two boss fellows, drove a well for Wm. Nelson, of Newville, Ind. They went down 127 feet, and got 65 feet of good soft water. He has got a mill attached to it. So you can call and get a good drink from China. It costs you nothing, and dont make you the least tipsy. W. N.

"Kib." has one of the pleasant places in town, and these improvements he is making will, we hope, act as a reminder to several others we know of who are also abundantly able to make their homes attractive.

Neighborhood Notes.

Angola Herald: Hon. D. D. Moody, of Auburn, was the defendant's attorney in the case of the State vs. Sam Gochenaur. The case was managed very skillfully, we are told, and resulted in the acquittal of the prisoner.

Hicksville News: The time-honored mill stones for grinding wheat are giving away to the "new process," which consists of mashing the grain between rollers revolving at different rates of speed, which it is claimed makes much better flour. The best flour in use in this country is made by using the rollers.

Goshen Times: Work on the C., W. & M. railway, between here and Elkhart, is carried on whenever the weather permits, and at Elkhart the erection of a bridge across the St. Joe is in progress. The depot grounds in that city have been located on Jackson street, between Gore's planing mill and the railroad.

Steuben Co. Journal: The subject which won the Maggie Ambler prize at the Hillsdale college Friday evening, February 17th, was "Drifting——Steering." Miss Ruth Coe, of Angola, was the successful contestant. The prize was the "Maggie Ambler pin," the value of which is about $20. The entertainment must have been an interesting one, judging from the subjects given on the programme, all of which are suggestive of nice thoughts.

Goshen Times: The other evening a bully from Texas, who is serving out a term in the jail at South Bend, refused to go into his cell. Officer Logan was called in, who at once disarmed the fellow, taking from him an iron bar, his chair and his coats, then locked the cell door so he could not get in. He then shut off the pipe which heats the jail corridor and left "Texas" all night in the cold. By next morning the Southerner was in a condition to give up the contest, and he refuses no more to go into his cell.

Angola Herald: Some person attempted to burn the Hendrickson school house last Friday night. Some half a dozen or more books that lay upon the desk were burned. Oil had been poured upon some of the seats and on the floor and a few matches scattered in the same locality, but, luckily, neither the oil nor matches were ignited. There is no clue to the incendiary. No oil had been kept or used in the house, and the one who attempted the outrage must have brought the oil there for that purpose. But what could have been the motive no one knows.

Hicksville News: The latest swindler is the produce buyer. He calls on a farmer, and, purchasing $10 or $15 worth of butter, eggs, or poultry, he asks a farmer for a receipt, to show the firm he paid the money. In writing the receipt the swindler breaks the point of his pencil about the time the signature is reached, when he takes a fountain pen from his pocket and hands it to the farmer to sign his name. The swindler goes to town, disposes of his purchase, and, erasing the body of the receipt, writes a note for $50 or $100 above the farmer's signature, and the note thus made he disposes of at the bank.

The Elkhart Review says: About eight years ago a man from South Bend, in attempting to board a train at this place in the night, was thrown under the cars and cut to pieces. The greater part of his body was discovered the next morning and shipped to his friends for burial, but shortly afterwards some other portions of it were found by G. W. Moulton, at present an engineer in the yard here, but at the time a fireman, who made a hole near the place the accident occured and buried them there. Out of curiosity, Mr. Moulton a few days ago disinterred the pieces of the remains of the unfortunate man, and was surprised to find the parts in a petrified state.

Steuben Co. Journal: One day last week we were shown a butchering apparatus, patented the 10th of January by George F. Dickinson, of Orland, and now owned by him in connection with John Beaver, of the same place. It seems to be quite convenient arrangement, and at the small sum for which it is offered will doubtless come into quite extensive use. By means of a lever which is made to revolve upon a post the animals may be placed in a barrel and scalded and then lifted to any disired place or position. We understand that a number of counties have already been sold to agents; and that the castings and right to use the apparatus are given for $7.00. The apparatus is worthy of examination.

Register: As a Register reporter and John Frederickson were walking south on Michigan street Sunday night at 10:30 o'clock the former noticed that Buckland Bros. printing office in the basement of 92 Michigan street, under Mrs. Fox's millinery store was brightly illuminated and remarked that they were working late. Proceeding a few steps farther he smelled smoke and heard the cracking of the flames. Believing the establishment was on fire an investigation was made by Frederickson kicking in the doors when the smoke rolled out in dense volumes. Had a pail or two of water been handy the flames could have been extinguished without the calling out of the department but none could be found. No. 4 soon arrived in answer to the alarm and the fire was speedily drowned out. It originated in a pile of waste paper beneath a counter and from some unknown cause. Buckland Bros. are unable to give an estimate of the loss as much material was ruined by the water, the fire doing comparatively no damage. They had $1,000 insurance in L. G. Tonge's agency.

SEED.

THE LARGEST IN THE WORLD.

CORN AND WATERMELONS.

CORN. Our "GIANT" Corn is a new and distinct variety, and is withal the best that any farmer ever grew. The grains are as large as the average size chestnut; the finest white dent ever grown; full, rich in starch, perfect hardy, and never failing to grow a strong and vigorous stalk, with firm, deep roots. The ears are uniform and of very large size. It will yield more than any other variety that can be raised, averaging from THREE to SIX EARS to the stalk. It is taking the place of all other varieties upon its first trial. It is matured, and can be gathered in TEN WEEKS, and grows as successfully in the North as the South.

WATERMELONS. Our "MIKON" Watermelons are the largest and finest in the World in every instance, and grow in any section of the country. Their average weight is from 75 to 125 POUNDS. The flesh is of a blood-red, very solid, luscious, crisp and sugary—far surpassing all other varieties, and, although a melon of such an enormous weight, there is barely half an inch rind. They are pronounced the finest shipping melon in the World. It will pay any farmer to try a sample package.

Corn—sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00, and $5.00 per bushel. Watermelons—Sample package 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00. Address all orders to the

SEVEN TIMES SIX.

By Jean Ingelow.

To bear, to nurse, to rear,
To watch and then to lose;
To see my bright ones disappear,
Drawn up like morning dews—
To bear, to nurse, to rear,
To watch and then to lose;
This have I done when God drew near
Among his own to chose.

To hear, to heed, to wed,
And with thy lord depart
In tears that he, as soon as shed,
Will let no longer smart—
To hear, to heed, to wed,
This while thou didst I smiled,
For now it was not God who said,
"Mother, give me my child."

O fond, O fool, and blind,
To God I gave with tears;
But when a man like grace would find,
My soul put by her fears—
O fond, O fool, and blind,
God guards in happier spheres;
That man will guard where he did bind
Is hope for unknown years.

To hear, to heed, to wed,
Fair lot that maidens choose,
Thy mother's tenderest words are said,
Thy face no more she views;
Thy mother's lot, my dear,
She doth in nought accuse;
Her lot to bear, to nurse, to rear,
To love—and then to lose.

ON A BLACKBOARD.

Mildred Parmenter sat in the little parlor, beating her foot impatiently on the striped red carpet. The August sun had poured into the window, and at the sides of the green paper curtains, perforated with pinholes and flapping in the breeze, she caught occasional glimpses of the mountains and the clouds, which made a marvelous picture in front of the old Vermont farmhouse. The neighbors had dropped in to see her aunt, and the three ladies, with their knitting work and occasional resort to their black paper-maiche snuff-boxes, were discussing the probable fate of a disagreeable farmer in the neighborhood, whose theft of a "yearling" was the chief topic of conversation in all the farmhouses within a dozen miles.

"An' they dew say" was one of the passing remarks that caught her ear, "that they haint never had an idee up to Goshen what sort of a critter 'twas he stole, til ole Miss Stevens, she said as haow she seen him agoin'—"

Miss Mildred's attention wandered. She found the conversation dull, but looked at the woman with a new curiosity. "And this is her life," she was thinking; "a clean apron, a pinch of snuff, and a neighbroly call after the dinner dishes are 'done up,' and discussion of old Mrs. Brown's paralytic stroke. Deacon Stebbin's third wife, Matilda Hine's success with her sage cheese, and the new bell on the town hall."

One of the thin, monotonous voices began again: "I'd just sot out to go with Mary Ann; you know she lives two miles from that there—"

Miss Mildred caught up to her hat, and sauntered out of the front door. Only a few rods away were the pine woods, cool, still, fragrant.

She seated herself at the foot of a gigantic tree, and, leaning her head against the trunk, went off into one of the reveries which lately seemed to fill the waking hours of her life.

A wagon came rattling along the crooked sandy road. Her uncle was returning from a trip to the village, and as he drove into the shed he called to her, Letters, darter."

It was always his name for her, she was so like a daughter he had lost. She waited for the letterr, not very impatiently. There were only two of them. The one from her sister she opened first.

"And Mr. Eison came yesterday," ran one of the paragraphs. "We told him of your fancy to bury yourself all summer in the rural districts, but assured him you would join us for a week, at least, before we returned to New York. Of course that is the only thing that prevents him from leaving springs at once. By the way, we heard before he came up that it was all over between you and Oscar, who is engaged to that cousin of his, Ella Hunt, who was always held up as amodle of all the virtues. I don't doubt that she is exactly suited to him. Mamma is delighted that Mr. Eison is going to stay with us. You know, Milly, what she has set her heart on, and of course you won't dissapoint us all. He has grown a little stouter than he was in the winter."

She threw the letter aside unfinished and sat perfectly still, her hands tightly clasped in her lap. Oscar Brant engaged to his cousin Ella! Well, that was according to the enternal fitness of things.

Ella had an amiable disposition, was dignified, serene and ladylike always. She never acted on impulse, never gave way to a quick temper, and had never done or said, in her whole life, a thing she had reason to be sorry for.

Yes, Mildred reflected she was altogether the proper person for Oscar Brant, and with a queer little laugh she thought of the hopeless difference between herself and this most admirable woman. But the laugh was so nearly akin to a sob that she dared not trust herself to go on thinking. She caught up the other letter from a young lady sojourning at Saratoga. It was addressed in a large, dashing hand, covering the entire envelope. "Why will she use violet ink?" was Mildred's thought as she opened it. It was as dashing inside as out.

"You are certainly a gay deceiver, my dear. To think that your health required rest and mountain air, so that you could neither give your family nor me the pleasure of your society. I understand it all now, and really I can't blame you. Oscar Brant is more entertaining than a hotel full of people, and handsomer than ever. I saw him just for a moment en route for Lake Champlain with his party. Camping out must be such fun. And to think you have an uncle living so conveniently near. Of course you see Oscar every day or two."

There was a four page description following of the costumes worn at a ball at the Grand Union. Mildred Parmenter to this day has never read a word of it.

"More news!" How little her Saratoga friend guessed at the truth of the case. And Oscar Brant was only four miles away. She could not help it now if the tears came. Why could they not let her alone, she thought. She had come up to the New England hills to gain some of the strength and peace she had lost after she and Oscar had parted. She must try for it harder than ever, now that the time drew near for her return to the city.

Her mother and sisters would wait for her at the Springs; Mr. Elson would wait, too; Mr. Elson, worth half a million, sixty years old, his head bald and shiny; a short, fat, fussy man, who had "grown a little stouter." Ugh! They would all go home together to the fall fashions, and dinner parties and formal calls. She thought suddenly of the stuffy parlor, and of the three ladies with their gossip about the new minister, and the neighborhood's mumps and measles. What was there to choose between these city and country lives? Despair at nineteen is a very hopeless sort of despair. Mildred laid her head on the ground with a great tearing sob. "Oh, how can I bear it?"

She went back to the house presently. She would conquer the foolishness, so she told herself, as she kept saying over and over again the whole summer long. She would conquer her temper, too; grow humble and docile and patient. If she tried hard, perhaps, before she grew to be a very old woman—and forty to her was an immense age—she might be amiable, too—serene, self-poised, and lovable. She was quite charmed with the ideal she immagined of herself. As for the great grief that had so worn upon her, it was righteous punishment for her pride and wilfulness. There was no one but herself to blame, and her sense of justice was keen. She must do her best to bear what she had brought upon herself.

Supper was nearly ready when she came in, a beautiful appeal to an artistic eye, with its heap of snow-white biscuits, deep golden butter, and purple grape jelly, but the flowers with which she always decked the table she had forgotten that afternoon. She went at once into the garden, meeting her uncle as he passed by with the foaming milk-pails.

"Don't forget my hollyhock, darter," he called out as he passed along.

Hollyhocks were a standing joke between them. She nodded brigthly. She had really a very and sound nature, for all her faults and shortcomings, and in the peaceful twilight time she fought a fight, in which she was helped by every outward condition.

When she came in again her uncle was carrying on a spasmodic conversation with his wife, who, out of sight in the buttery, was straining the milk.

"An' if they can't find some one to take the school," he was saying, it'll have to be shet up awhile."

"What school?" Mildred asked, caring less for the answer than for the effect of a great pansy she was settling among the china-asters.

"Here in our own deestrict. Teacher's sick, an' they can't seem to find no one to take her place."

Mildred had seen the teacher, a pale young girl, who went home every night by her uncle's house, with several little ones beside her. They were barefooted, to be sure, but bright-eyed and rosy-cheeked.

"How many scholars are there?" she asked, a sudden impulse taking possession of her.

"Not more'n twenty, I reckon. It's a summer school, so tain't never very large."

"Uncle, would they let me take it?"

"You, darter!"

"Yes, I believe I should enjoy it, and it would do me good, besides giving the teacher a little rest. She looks as if she needed it."

So it came about that Mildred Parmenter, meeting the children in the road the next morning, introduced herself to them as the lady who would take care of them till their teacher got well; and with a big key in her hand, went across the field with them with a more postive feeling of content and happiness than she had known for months.

It was a queer, little log school-house to which they went, one of the primitive sort; From all the windows were magnificent views of the mountains; but Mildred improved even on that advantage, by occasionally having recitations out of doors, a departure from the orthodox fashion very gratifying to the youthful mind. She had little contact with the country people, and the peculiar dialect, the homely simplicity of the life and marked characteristics of pupils, continually amused her. Bobby Williams, her youngest scholar, had a strong propensity for chewing gum, a habit which seriously interfered with a naturally defective articulation, but which he sacrified for the good graces of his teacher. With Maggie Wetherbee, her oldest pupil, she formed almost an intimacy, listening with interest to the long confidences twanged through a very pretty nose, of her trials in attending baby, picking "garden sass" and laying down pickles.

Poor Maggie, she learned, was also the victim of an ardent attachment, severely disapproved at home, for a "hand," employed during haying on her father's farm. Between these two extremes in age, she found almost every variety of taste and disposition, realizing that she had entered on a fertile field of usefullness and enjoyment.

She wrote to her sister a very comical account of her experiment, laughing aloud as she pictured the disgust of her lady mother, indulged in the wildest dreams of an independent career, and in a few weeks had become convinced that there was really a great deal in life worth living.

It was little Harley Jone's turn that week to "rig up" the school house, as he termed it, and Mildred wondered for two successive days at clusters of flowers which she found on her desk. The great double geraniums seemed to flash their scarlet glory all over the room; and the heliotropes, too, her favorite flower, in masses of purple beauty, filled the air with their fragrance. A spray of it, with a few delicate ferns, another of her delights, was laid upon the Bible opened at a chapter with which she began the day's exercise. Harley Jones had certainly a taste and appreciation for which she had never given him credit.

He was vigorusly cleaning the blackbord one morning as she came in just in time to see the last few words as he erased them. The writing struck her peculiarly.

"What did you rub out, Harley?" she asked, hanging up her hat in the corner.

"Something you writ yesterday, Miss Carpenter. I was writin' it over." She smiled at the name. He never could get it right, but she corrected the other slips in his speech.

"You mean something, Harley, and you should say I wrote it. Can you remember?"

"He jest done it hisself," piped up a voice behind them. I seen him when I come in."

"Oh, Johnnie Mack!" was the teacher's exclamation, "after I had told you so many times." Yet no possible mutilation of verbs seemed to affect her love for the offenders, or to diminish her patience with them, and in the course of the day she noticed that Harley Jones had really made improvements in his copy-book. But she had occasion to reprove Maggie Wetherbee as they walked home together that night.

"I saw you talking with a man this morning, Maggie, when I came across the lot. Is it possible that you meet anyone in that way outside your father's house?"

"But 'twasn't him," stammered Maggie, growing red.

"Him! Who?"

"Why, Bill, that I told you about. I didn't expect to meet him," she added, growing redder with the consciousness of how easily the stranger could make her false to Bill. "He's a boarding somewhere round, and just asked me how soon school would be out. He's drawing a picture of our school-house—and that's all. He had lots of pictures in a big flat book."

A stolling artist, Mildred thought. She knew nothing about artists, but had an idea thay were inoffensive people. Still she determined to watch Maggie. She must not drift into any danger.

Mildred went earlier to school the next morning, earlier even than Harley Jones. Fresh flowers were on the desk again, but with a start she saw the figure of a man at the blackboard writing. "I am here," were the words he was rapidly tracing with the chalk, "and must see you if—" Just then he turned, conscious of a presence, but not before she had recovered her self-possession.

"Good morning," she said quietly, extending her hand, and with a smile glanced from his face to the blackboard.

He caught her hand and held it.

"Mildred, are you ready to forgive me yet?"

She drew her hand away and stepped back.

"I have nothing to forgive in you, Oscar. I was angry when I saw you last, but I was the one to blame. Forgive me."

He looked at her in astonishment; she seemed so utterly unlike herself.

"And have you got over your love, as well as your anger, Mildred?"

The quick color flashed all over her face. She looked like herself once more, as she answered:

"That question is in poor taste, Oscar Brandt. I have not congratulated you on your engagement to your cousin Ella. I do so heartily," she went on, plunging along into a chaos of words, lest she should break down utterly; "she is good and gentle and—and anything that I am not. She—" her voice failed her after all.

"Why, Mildred, what in the world are you talking about?" His arms were around her. She was sobbing on his shoulder. "Where did you hear such a ridiculous story?"

Maggie Weatherbee entered breathlessly. "Miss Parmenter—" then she stopped, bewildered at the sight before her eyes. Bobby Whitman and Harley Jones had been quarreling. They came up behind Maggie, each eager to exonerate himself. But the wet eyes and flushed face of their teacher made friends of them instantly. "Is it her beau?" whispered Harley, as he nudged Bobby, but Maggie hustled them both out of the room without ceremony, hurrying after them herself, and before the teacher recalled them the question seemed to be satisfactorily answered.

It was well that the regular teacher could resume her duties the next week, for by that time Mildred was abundantly willing to give them up. Yet she always declared that teaching was the most delightful work in the world, and that she found the happiness of her life on a blackboard.

One of the Aborigines.

Louis Watzeau, an Indian, who was born in 1776, is living at Lake George, in his one hundred and sixth year. He is in his second childhood in many respects. His health is good, he has a good appetite, and he enjoys his pipe in true Indian fashion. He was born at St. Francis, now known as Pierreville, Canada. For his bravery and superior qualifications as a warrior, he was commissioned by Queen Victoria, during the second year of her reign, the first or Grand Chief of the Banagwois Tribe of Indians in Canada. The commission was given at Quebec. It is on parchment, and is now in possession of one of the Chief's daughters, Mrs. Susan Camp, with whom he lives. He has two daughters and one son living. Mrs. Sophia Paul, in her eighty-second year, is the eldest of the three. Among the decendants of Mrs. Paul the fifth generation is represented by a young man nearly twenty years of age. The old Chief used to recieve yearly from the British Govenment a large quantity of clothing and amunition. His children left Canada Several years ago and settled in this State. The aged warrior became infirm, and his daughters took him to their home. A yearly pension of $25 has lately been assigned to him by the Dominion of Canada. There is an effort in progress by an officer of the Dominion to secure back pay due Watzeau. The old man stays in the house most of the time. He is quite cheerful and childlike.

Death from Eating Snow.

Richmond Whig.

Samuel Black, a young colored man, living near Abingdon, started with his cousin George, a few days ago, on a long walk. He was going to visit an uncle, it appears, where was making prepration to be married. On the way he remarked jocularly that he had eaten no breakfast and was hungry, but he added: "Here's plenty to eat lying around loose." So saying he began cramming the snow as he walked. His cousin protested, but he kept on eating the snow until he had swallowed a large quantity. In a little while he showed symptoms of illness, and as they were in a desert place his cousin finally had to carry him in his arms. He was taken to the nearest house, Mrs. McConnell's, when he began to be violently ill; a physician was sent for and, meantime, salt was administered to vomit him. Nothing availed, and in a few hours the young man breathed his last, after intense suffering.

MURDER AND SUICIDE.

Troy special to New York Herald.

The particulars of the murder of Caroline Loux by William Jacobs, and his subsequent suicide in the town of Grafton, show that the double crime was embellished with one almost unexampled incident. As was stated in yesterday's dispatch, Mrs. Loux was a sister-in-law of Jacobs, the latter and Adam Loux having married sisters. Mrs. Loux nearly two years ago refused to live with her husband because he was opposed to having Jacobs to come to their house. For several years there had been an ill-feeling existing between the brothers-in-law on account of family difficulties. Hence Loux's dislike to the calls which Jacobs made at his house. His wife always courted Jacobs's company, especially since the death of his wife, one year ago the 1st of last January. Owing to Loux's dislike to the intimacy between his wife and Jacobs, Mrs. Loux, who owns the farm, drove him from home, and he has since resided with one of his sons a couple of miles away.

The house of Mrs. Loux is about one-eighth of a mile from that of Jacobs. The house is a comely structure, divided into three apartments, and its interior, when I visited it, presented a neat and cozy appearance, when taking into consideration the horrible scenes that had been enacted within its walls a few hours previously. Upon the bed in one corner of the room lay Mrs. Loux, the victim of Jacobs's murderous assault. She was evidently suffering great agony. The medical examination of her case revealed a lacerated wound upon the forehead, about three inches long, sufficient to expose the bone, although not near enough to fracture the skull, and a bullet wound on the left side near the arm pit and beneath the clavicle. The bullet had taken a downward and inward course, and it is probably lodged in the upper lobe of the left lung. One or two blood clots were found on the neck. The left breast presented a badly discolored appearance, as though it had been struck with a heavy blunt instrument. Dr. Allen, by direction of Coroner Green, probed the bullet wound, and succeeded in penetrating over three inches. Mrs. Loux was several times through the day thought to be dead, but, upon the arrival of the Coroner and Jury, she had revived sufficiently to recognize Dr. Allen. It is believed by the physician and the Coroner that her case is an extremely critical one, and that it is only a matter of a few hours before death will ensue.

The night of Feb. 2d will long be fearfully remembered by little Libbie Loux. Libbie is twelve years of age, and was the youngest of the Loux family. She is a handsome, though illiterate, little person, and relates the circumstances of the sad tragedy vividly and with but little emotion. She gives the details of the affair as follows: "I was sitting here. I was sewing on some shirts, and mother was working about the room. It was between 6 and 7 o'clock, when we heard some one come to the window and look in. The first thought that struck me was that it was Uncle William, and I went to the door and said: 'You needn't try to scare us, for we know it is you, Uncle Will.' Uncle William then walked into the house. He has always been in the habit of visiting us in the evening, and we didn't think anything of his coming that evening. He took a seat near the stove on that side (pointing). I returned to my sewing and was sitting with my back toward him. He and mother were talking about grand mother and some of our relatives. Mother was asking him if they were well, and they talked about other things too. After talking about an hour he asked for a few matches, and I got him some. He said that was what he came after, as he had none at home. He sat down again and was talking to mother. Mother went on the opposite side of the stove and stooped down to take a loaf of bread out of the oven, when he got up and passed around to where she was, and in a moment I heard a shot. I looked around and saw him standing near mother. She said, 'William, I don't know what you want to kill me for, I never did you any harm.' He raised his revolver and fired again and then he took hold of mother and threw her on the floor. Then he went over there and picked up that ax and came over there to where mother was lying, and took it in one hand and struck her on the head with the back of it. I was so frightened that I ran to the window and broke the glass out, and tried to jump out, for the door was locked and he had the key in his pocket, and I thought perhaps he would murder me. He took hold of me as I was going to jump out. I pulled away from him, and he took his revolver and put it to his head and shot himself twice, and then laid it down and picked up the ax and tried to knock his brains out with it. He kept mumbling something to himself. I could not understand what he said. My brother Henry had gone to Grafton Center to attend a donation party, and I thought that if uncle William knew it was time for him to come he would go home. So I said to mother, who was lying on the floor, 'Mother, shall I be getting tea ready for Henry?' But that did not start him.

"I then thought to myself, I know how to get rid of him. So I set the clock ahead four hours when he was not looking. Then I said, 'Oh, mother! do you see what time it is?' As I said this Uncle William had a pair of scissors jabbing them into his head with all his might. Then he laid them down and got a large pair of shears, and tried to cut his throat with them. When I spoke of the time he looked at the clock and then ran out of the side door and down the road just as tight as he could go, leaving his hat and coat here in the house. I then stopped up the windows as best I could, for it was awful cold out doors, and then I didn't know what to do, for I thought mother was dying and I was all alone, a mile from any neighbor's, excepting Uncle William's. I took care of mother until most morning, when I dragged her up to the bed and got her upon it. It was hard work, for she did not know anything and could not help herself. About four o'clock brother Henry came home. I told him what had happened, and told him I guessed Uncle William had killed himself. He started for his house, and on his way he met Cousin William (the murderer's son), and he told Henry that his father was dead."

William Jacobs jr. told the following story: "I have not seen my father, alive, since last Tuesday. I attended the donation party last night and got home about 8:30. When I got in the house I found my father lying dead on the floor, surrounded by blood, and a razor in his hand. I took the razor out of his hand and laid it on the table, and gave the alarm."

It appears that Jacobs had contemplated self-distruction for several weeks, for his daughter Caroline says that recently her father asked her to mend his pantaloons, at the same time saying: "It will be the last time you'll have to mend them for me." He had told others that he intended to kill himself, and endeavroed to borrow a revolver from different persons for that purpose. Some time between Tuesday and Thursday he procured a revolver from a nephew. It is stated by members of the Jacobs family, and not denied by any of the Louxes, that since the death of Jacob's wife Mrs Loux has several time endevored to persuade him to leave his family, saying that she would dispose of her property and they could go to parts unknown. Jacobs was fifty-one years old, and had six children, and he told her that he dreaded to part from them. Mrs. Loux is fifty-two years old and the mother of five children, but notwithstanding these facts, he was infatuated with her. Being drawn in one direction by ties of family affection and in the other by the influence of a lewe woman, he determined to die by his own hand. It is not believed that the thought of murdering Mrs. Loux entered his mind before calling on her on Thursday night, but he did intend to end his life before morning, and the opportunity for him to go to his sister in-law's at the time when his mind was in this state suggested to him the double tragedy.

A Wonderful Tree.

Clinton, N. J., Cor. Philadelphia Times.

A farmer living near Schooley Mountain has greatly excited his neighbors by an account of a wonderful tree which he discovered several years since. He says that for three years it has gone through the cold weather without shedding a leaf. It is a maple tree, and its sap makes a very good maple sugar. The farmer noticed it first while following the trail of a fox over the mountain early in December, 1878. All the other trees, even of the same species, were entirely bare, while this tree had not, to all appearances, lost a single leaf. There were no dried leaves underneath it, and the leaves on the branches were all green. It was with great difficulty that a leaf could be pulled from the twig to which it was fastened, and a strong breeze, which was blowing at the time had no effect upon the leaves. So astonished was the discoverer at the phenomenon that he forgot all about the fox he was after and the cold character of the day, and spent several hours examining the tree. He went home greatly puzzled, and returned several days later with a clergyman living in the vicinity. They determined to mark several of the leaves, and see how long they remained where they were. They also resolved to keep the thing a secret, and watch its progress until Spring. This they did. When April arrived the leaves which they had marked were just as green and fresh as in December, and the tree itself was not affected in the least by the severity of the weather and the many windy blasts.

The bark was tapped every week and yielded a plentiful supply of sap; enough to keep the farmer and minister's families in syrup all Winter long. The same has been tried ever since; not a leaf has fallen to the best of their belief since the day the tree was noticed, and the sap has flowed with the same regularity and profusion. As far as can be ascertained there is no cause for the mysterious vitality of that particular maple. There is nothing in the soil or subsoil to render growth more available or make the trunk and branches better able to stand the storms and cold weather. A number of people have lately visited the curiosity, but each one comes away perfectly mystified. At the present time not another tree on the whole mountain, with the exception of several evergreens near the hotels, has a leaf on it, and the trunks and branches stand out bleak and bare. This maple is in an exposed spot, unprotected from the winds and surrounded by rocks. Just why it is as it is baffles the ingenuity of all beholders. Even the regular December fox hunt is cast in the shade by this perpetually green maple tree.

A Big Fish Story.

New York Times.

The steamship Newport, of Ward's line, which is now having her bottom scraped and painted on the dry dock at the foot of Market street, had an unusual experience during her recent outward trip to Havana. She sailed from this port on Thursday, October 27th, and before daylight the next morning she was off the capes of Delaware. At about 8 o'clock, when she was steaming at about the rate of fifteen miles an hour, she ran into an immense school of whales twenty miles long and a quarter of a mile wide. The animals were of all sizes, and disported themselves in the water as if they enjoyed it. Suddenly the ship shook from stern to stern as she struck a monster about sixty feet long which was attempting to cross the path of the Newport. The whale was cut in halves, while the water was dyed red with his blood. The steamer came to a standstill, and her stem was examined. It was found to have escaped injury, but the steering gear was found to be slightly deranged. This was soon repaired, and the Newport proceeded, but the passengers were not so delighted with the whales as they had been before the shock. The sight of the monster's head, as it shot upward from the water had been anything but pleasant to them. Ten minutes after the vessel started up there was another and a heavier shock, which almost threw the passengers from their feet. Another whale had been cut in two. The body of the animal passed under the vessel, and struck the propeller with great violence. The engineer rushed on deck, imagining that the ship had struck a submerged wreck. Captain Sundberg ordered the course of the ship changed, and she soon ran out of the troublesome whales. The oldest sea-going men on the Newport, and some of them had been on whaling vessels, could not remember such an experience.

A Horse Story.

New York Star.

An incident which goes to show the sagacity of the horse occurred on Sunday night. Chief Bates had been out to a small fire, and on returning to Fire Headquarters, on Mercer street, alighted from his wagon and entered the building, leaving his horse unfastened. Before the Chief had climbed the stairs an alarm came from box No. 225, located on Stanton and Attorney streets. Persons who witnessed the scene say that the animal pricked up its ears as the gong sounded, and, before the last stroke had died away, was galloping away down Mercer street without its driver. On reaching Prince street it turned east, dashed through to the Bowery at breakneck speed, and then headed for Stanton street. At that point two heavy wagons were passing, and the horse ran into one, capsizing the vehicle to which it was attached. Policemen surrounded and captured the animal, which appeared frightened by the mishap. The officers recognized the horse, and fearing that an accident had happened Chief Bates, returned it to fire headquarters. As the well trained horse had never ran away before, the only solution to Sunday night's escapade advanced by the Fire Department is that the animal located the fire by the gong and set out for the scene of the alarm without awaiting the guiding hand of his master. When the collision occurred the horse was within a few blocks of the fire, and was going in the right direction to it.

A Revival Preacher.

The Rev. George O. Barnes has fairly outstripped the Boy Evangelist Harrison as a sensational revival preacher. His meetings attract crowds in Louisville. His bottle of oil is still in request, and with it he anoints the foreheads of all converts. But he is something more than grotesque. His power of oratory is remarkable. He can make his audience roar with his comical mimicry or weep by his pathos. Again, he carries their feelings by storm. "This is a poor body for an immortal soul," he exclaimed, indicating his by no means robust physique, "But I have in this breast the element of eternal life. It is a poor, hacked, worthless body, but the soul is there. I can feel it throbbing and throbbing like a big engine in a battered old ship. With every turn of the great wheels," and his hands, tremble with energy, his body shaking with suppressed strain, and his eyes lighted up with intense fire—"with every turn of the great wheels the old hulk trembles and groans and quivers; it may go to pieces, but the engine throbs on stronger and better than the hulk, full of power and life." He tells his his converts that they need never be ill if they will lead perfectly holy lives, in which case they would be caught up to heaven without dying.

A decision has just been rendered by the Directors of the Mint regarding the habit of filling holes in punched coin, which will be of considerable interest. It is, in effect, that a coin once punched or mutilated can only be consider as bullion thereafter, even though the holes be filled with the same quality of metel. This will spoil what some jewelers have made quite a prosperous business of late.

The Western Associated Press reporter asked Senator Voorhees about the story telegraphed from here recently to the effect that certain prominent Democrats, including Mr. Voorhes, Morgan, of Alabama, and Jere Black, were secretly scheming with Blaine to run Blaine and Voorhees as candidates for President and Vice President '84, and give them the support of the Democratic party. Voorhees said the story was too absurd to deserve even the deniel, that there was nothing in it, and he did not propose to dignify it by taking any notice of it. Senator Morgan, of Alabama, said the whole thing was a fiction. He had seen Blaine twice in as as many months, and then only for a few minutes at a time, and no reference to politics was made in their conversation. Morgan said: "I don't think Mr. Blaine would ever trust his political fortunes to such Democrats as Voorhees, Jere Black and myself. I like Blaine very much personally, but he is not the man I would nominate for President. I believe in straight, unadulterated Democracy, and if I had my way, I would place the party upon Democratic principles. I would relieve it of Tammany in New York, of readjusterism in Virginia, and of repudiation everywhere, and I would nominate firm and true Democrats like Thurman and Hendricks, or a number of others that could be named, for President." Senator Morgan added that he did not believe in any political coalitions; that he would rather suffer defeat with a pure Democratic ticket and platform than to win victory by a coalition and mixture of principles. Among Democrats here this story is generally pronounced absurd and laughed at, but there are a few, comprising those who are not friendly to Blaine, who shake their heads and say that if this story is not literally true, they believe that machinations looking to Democratic support of Blaine in the next Presidential canvass are going on.

It is now believed that Danenhower has fully recovered his reason, and that his general health, as well as that of the other members of his party, is being gradually restored.

THE STATE.

The growing wheat of Indiana, according to reports from various parts of the State, never looked better or gave promise of a more luxuriant crop.

At Terre Haute, two thieves managed to steal $1,500 from Shannon's Bank. One of them, who hails from Chicago, was arrested, but the one with the cash escaped.

Dave Holler, who lived about thirty miles south of Carthage, who had gone to look after some traps he had set, was found dead in the woods. He is supposed to have died of epilepsy.

Samuel Sunderland, of Delaware county, has given a 120 acre farm to each of his eight children. He has a splendid home farm of 190 acres left, where he will reside and labor.

Dr. O. H. Thomas, a leading dentist of Pendleton, has disappeared suddenly under suspicion of being too intimate with a young servant girl named Carrie Collins. The girl attempted suicide a short time ago.

A four-months-old child of Frank and Laura Clements, of Crawfordsville, died Monday morning of strangulation, caused by a crying fit. The child was in unusual good health until the moment of its death.

Irwin Miller, a teacher in the public schools of Middletown, Henry county, was arrested on the charge of cruelly whipping a little girl, one of his scholars. He pleaded guilty in the circuit court and was fined heavily.

John Black, who was shot by Robinson, in Brown county on Monday, for traducing the character of Robinson's sister, died on Tuesday. Robinson is still at liberty, the sympathy of the community being with him.

Dr. J. C. Comstock, of Marietta Shelby county, called from his house recently and severely whipped by J. K. P. Shaw, Oscar Crawford and George Hunter, has brought suit for $2,000 damages against them on account of injuries received.

John P. Cravens, son of Hon. John R. Cravens, of Madison, died from an overdose of morphine taken to allay nervousness. Mr. Cravens was thirty-eight years of age, served with distinction throughout the late war. He leaves a wife and one child.

Some friends of the prisoners in the Warsaw calaboose threw coal oil into it and set it on fire Sunday, for the purpose of freeing the inmates. The plan did not work, however, for the prisoners, under a strong guard, were removed to a place of safety, but the jail was burned.

A daughter of Joseph Saberton, of Evansville, who has given her parents a good deal of trouble, having been in jail for stealing, and other misdemeanors, attempted to put an end to the chronic state of bobbery by mixing poison in the biscuit. She made her parents deathly sick, but they were pumped out and she escaped.

A wonderful religious revival is in progress at New Albany. It has been going on for the past six weeks, and sinners are being gathered in by scores every night. At the Centenary M. E. church about 160 have been converted; at Wesley chapel over sixty have professed; at the German M. E. church over fifty; at the Third Presbyterian church about a venty-five. The interest is on the increase, and promises to extend to all the churches.

Twelve or fifteen years ago an old man named Burke, who lived in Shelby county, near the Bartholomew line, went hunting, carrying with him a fine silver trimmed rifle—a weapon that was famous in that region. Since then he has never been heard from. Recently the rifle was discovered in the possession of a man named Jackson. It has passed through several hands before coming into Mr. Jackson's possession, and efforts are being made to trace its history, with a view to clearing up the mystery of Burke's disappearance.

In one of the German Lutheran churches of Harrison county there is an aggravated case of scandal. The pastor of this church last summer took a trip to Germany, leaving his wife and family at home while he made the visit. But it has leaked out that he took another woman with him, whom he passed off as his wife. The church members are indignant over the "social outrage," and have invited the preacher to resign, which he will do, and travel westward. He had previously stood very high with his congregation, and the church is greatly torn up over his moral derilliction.

Jake Painter had his own way in Brown county, for a number of years, and a bad way it was. His wife got a divorce and married again; but he drove away her husband and compelled her to return to him, frightening her so thoroughly that she remained. A neighbor offended him, and he retaliated by poisoning cattle, until the family moved away to avoid his persecution. He shot three men who at various times opposed him, and escaped punishment through the cowardice of the witnesses. A few days ago he went to Thomas Robinson'l house, near by, and demanded that Mrs. Robinson be given to him. It is not stated whether the woman regarded the proposed transfer favorably; but Robinson certainly did not, and, when Painter threatened him with death for refusing, shot the bully dead.

IT is said that the State Board of Health is preparing to establish a vaccine farm near Evansville.

AN encampment of the State militia will be held at Indianapolis sometime between June 20th and July 1st

ADJUTANT GENERAL CARNAHAN is counting the cost on a proposition to hold an encampment of the State militia in Indianapolis next June.

THE Directors of the Northern Prison, assisted by Governor Porter, have recently been investigating charges and complaints against Warden Murdock, to the effect that he was enriching himself upon contracts and perquisits at the expense of the people of the State. The investigation disclosed abuses of long standing, which fully sustained the charges and complaints, and the result was the annulment of contracts and cutting off of perquisites which will divert from $7,000 to $8,000 a year from the pockets of the the prison warden into the treasury of the State. Reform was necessary.

TRAVEL IN SIBERIA.

Col. Thomas W. Knox has written the following letter in regard to the search for the Jeannette sufferers:

"Lieut. Danenhower and his comrades are about to leave Irkutsk for St. Petersburg on their way to the United States, and two officers of our navy have just been ordered to Siberia to assist in the search for Capt. DeLong and the missing men. It has therefore been suggested to me that a brief discription of the Siberian post road which these parties will travel would be specially interesting at this time.

"In November, 1866, I left Irkutsk for St. Petersburg; the terminus of the railway was then at Nijni Novgorod, 3400 miles from the former city. Winter is the best time for travel in Siberia, as the roads are smoother than at other seasons of the year, and one is not annoyed by dust and mosquitoes. If you travel by the post vehicles belonging to the station masters you must change at every station, and transfe of yourself and baggage four or five times a day, with the thermometer below zero, is the reverse of pleasant. Consequently most persons prefer to buy a carriage or a sleigh at starting, and sell it for what it will bring at the end of the route, I became the owner of a 'kibitka,' or one half-open sleigh, which some what resembles a New England chaise, greatly elongated. There was abundant room for two of us, and we could be at full length on our furs and baggage, or sit half upright with pillows enough to wedge us closely into our places. At night or in a storm we could lower a hood at the top and fasten it to a thick apron from below, so that we were fairly protected from severe weather. Baggage is in flat valises of soft leather, and spread over the bottom of the sleigh; the crevices and chinks are filled with straw, a layer of furs or sheepskins covers the whole, and on this you sit or lie at your pleasure. It is judicious to lash it with ropes to preven its tumbling out on top of you in case of an upset.

The post stations are from 10 to 20 miles apart, and from Irkutsk to Nijni Novgorod I changed horses and drivers 206 times, and was drawn by not far from 1000 horses altogether. On arriving at a station you present your paderojina, or road pass, to the station master, and demand horses; if your pass is of a high order you will get them at once, but if there is no reason why he should expedite you, he may keep you waiting several hours, or until you bribe him into supplying your wants. The road pass is only obtainable from the authorities, and as horses cannot be supplied without it, there is no chane of an 'irregular' person traveling about the country. The pass states your name and residence, the number of horses you are entitled to demand and pay for, and also states very explicitly your destination. The ordinary team is three horses, and each horse is to be paid for at the rate of a kopeck a and half per verst—about a cent and half per mile. The driver expects a small fee at the end of his course, so that the expense of being drawn over a Siberian road is about five cents a mile for two persons. If the roads are good you are carried along at fine speed, especially if you hint that a liberal fee will be forthcoming. It is not unusual to make ten or twelve miles an hour, and not unfrequently thirteen miles would be covered in that time. The performance of a Russian driver is something rather trying to a nervous person; he descends hills at a breakneck speed and is utterly regardless of shaking you up. Late in winter the roads are full of hollows, or "hog-wallows," especially on the hill sides, and when a team is driven over them at a gallop the sleigh jumps in a manner a great deal more than exhilerating. As long as the vehicle preserves its integrity the driver pays it no attention. This sort of thing brings on what the Russians call the road fever; the pulse is high, and every bound of the sleigh forces the blood through the veins at a fearful pressure. Your head seems ready to burst, and the feeling at each jar of the vehicle, is very much as though somebody was trying to drive a railroad spike into your skull. The fever generally subsides in two or three days, but sometimes it is so severe that the traveler becomes delirious and must take several hours of rest at each stage.

"I followed the Russian plan in preparing for the journey. I had fur socks over my ordinary ones, fur stockings outside the socks, and fur boots inclosing all. Over my ordinary clothing I wore a sheepskin coat with the wool inside and fastening tight around the neck. Outside of this was a deerskin coat that touched the ground when I stood erect, and was large enough inside for a man and a boy; its collar was a foot wide, and the sleeves, six inches longer than the arms inside, were very inconvenient when I tried to pick up anything. Fur clothing in such amount is a personal incumbrance, but without it the traveler would suffer from the severe cold. The lowest temperature I experienced on the road was 40° below zero. A bottle of champagne became perfectly solid the first day of the sleigh ride, and I discovered a tendency to crystallization in a bottle of poor brandy that belonged to my companion.

"Though the frost cannot penetrate a traveler's furs, it constantly assails his face and congeals the moisture of his breath; beard and furs frequently freeze together and render sudden movements inconvenient. A moustache becomes a double ended icicle in a short time, and a lady will soon tell you that her veil is soon converted into a good counterfeit of a wire screen. It was a season of fasting when I made my journey, and the stations could not be relied on for any provisions, except bread and eggs, unless we include hot water for making tea. Russians drink vast quantities of tea while traveling, and many who are addicted to stimulating drinks while at home abstain from them altogether on the road and drink nothing but tea. We carried most of our provisions in a frozen state and thawed them out at the stations as we wanted them. Soup was in cakes like small bricks, and roast beef resembled red granite. We had a bag of pilmania—a Russian preparation of little meat balls covered with an envelope of dough—and this bag was our great reliance. The contents were like walnuts from the effects of the frost; a double handful dropped in a gallon of water and boiled for five minutes made a substantial soup or stew, and we found this article of sustenance more convenient than any other.

"Along the road there was little change of scenery. The country is undulating, but not broken, and in some places there are plains that resemble our western prairies. The landscape, or rather snowscape, is monotonous and wearisome, except where it is crossed by rivers and the few ranges of hills along the route. The villages containing the stations were from ten to twenty miles apart, and generally built in a single street. Out-side of nearly every village was a block-house, where exiles are lodged on their way to the places of their banishment; the movements of these involuntary emigrants are so timed that only a given number are lodged in any one house t the same time—not so much in consideration of the comfort of the exiles as through fear of attempts at revolt and escape. While the horses were changed at the stations, we had the option of entering the house or staying outside; we generally did the latter, except at meal times, as the change from several degrees below to sixty or seventy above is not altogether agreeable. The rooms of Russian houses are warmed by brick stoves, and among the peasants the top of the stove is the favorite sleeping place. At night we used to stir the drivers out from where they were being slowly baked; their toilets were quickly preformed, as it only included donning a sheepskin coat and buckling a belt around the waist, and then they were ready for a drive of two or three hours through an arctic temperature.

"The most perilous part of the journey is across the Balahinsky Steppe in Western Siberia, a plain a thousand miles wide, and often swept by severe storms. The snow is whirled in blinding masses, the wind, if blowing from the north, is bitter cold, and not infrequently men and horses perish. Travel ceases during these storms, and sometimes those who venture to brave them never reach their destination. Wolves abound here, and many stories are told of their ferocity, but they are less dangerous than in Western Russia, where the population is more dense and game less abundant than in Siberia; even there they never attack men except in the severest winters when hunger has made them desperate.

"A Siberian journey generally begins in the evening, and is continued day and night until its end. The government couriers will go from Irktusk to Moscow in fourteen or fifteen days under favorable circumstances, but a more dignified and less fatiguing pace will cover the distance in twenty-two or twenty five days. The larger the party the slower will be its progess, and it is not likely that Lieut. Danenhower and his comrades will arrive at St. Petersburgh in less than a month from their departure from Irktusk. They will be certain to receive all possible attention from Russians along the route, and it is by no means improbable that they may be detained a day or two in each of the half a dozen towns, in order that the inhabitants can have have an opportunity of showing their sympathy for the survivors of the lost Jeannette and their good will for all Americans.

Selecting Seeds.

If a little time is given to crops when growing to observe certain plants with careful memoranda of peculiarities of each during that time till the period of harvesting, and then selecting not only the best seeds, but from the most prolific plants, there is no limit to the improvement that would be made in our crops. At present, as a general thing, this work is left in the hands of a few enterprising farmers and seedmen, and with such a small number of experimenters so engaged, it is wonderful to observe the great progress made, and the benefit they have done the farmers. How important it is, then, that every one who cultivates a farm should give some attention to the selection of seeds.

It is not always by chance that good varieties are brought into notice. Instances can be mentioned in which careful selection of seed alone has more than doubled following crops. Colonel William Porcher Miles, of Nelson county, Virginia, formerly member of Congress from the Charleston district of South Carolina, a name well known, grew corn at the rate of 145 bushels to the acre by carefully selecting his seed each year. The stalks bore as many as seven ears—few less than four—and of the best quality, the weight of grains being very heavy and the cob small. This corn, however, grew on good bottom land, and had much in its favor; but common corn close by only gave the usual yield. The great yields of corn all over the country when unexceptionally large, were from selected seed; and the selection of seed so often done at random, is really one of the most important matters to observe. When a new variety is introduced and is tried by the farmer he should not relax vigilance in keeping it up to quality, for this negligence has been the cause of much dissatisfaction on the part of those who have experimented with introduced varieties, but who are prone to suppose that the seed must remain at the standard through successive generations without effort on their part to prevent its deterioration. And as this important matter applies not only to corn, but to every other vegetable, farmers should be as careful of seed and its selection as of the animals they desire to breed from and improve. If every farmer would make it a special object to improve his seed by careful selection, it would add to our national wealth to the extent of millions, lessening the expense of cultivation and adding to the individual possessions of each one who puts it into practice. Those who have been enterprising enough to improve certain varieties of plants have been well repaid for so doing, many realizing handsome sums therefrom; but this fact demonstrates that farmers do not object to improvement. What they should do, however, is to undertake such improvement as a class and make the object a special one.

Big Nosed People.

Napoleon was not the first person to declare a preference for big nosed people. A century before his birth the author of "Nugæ Venales," in response to his own question, pronounced "the biggest nose the best nose," instancing the cases of the Roman Emperors. Numa's nose was half a foot, and earned for him the honorable surname of Pompilius. According to Pultarch, Lycurgus and Solon ran to nose, and so did all the Roman kings except Tarquinius Superbus, and he was dethroned. Homer's nose was seven inches. "Big Noses," says Vigneuil Marville, "are held in honor everywhere in the world, except among the Chinese and Tartars." Titus Livius, Ovid, Camons and St. Charles Borromeo may be enumerated among men of enviable nasal development. Henry III.'s brother, Francis duke of Alencon, had his nose fairly cleft in two by the ravages of small-pox, a fact which inspired the epigram, when in 1583 he made a perfidious attempt on the friendly City of Antwerp, concerning two noses befitting a double face. Cyrano de Begerac had so huge a nose that he went about perpetually with his hand on his sword, prepared to punish those who stared at him.

The Specter of the Vicksburg Siege.

[Gen. Landrum in a recent address.]

I remember to have been standing on a knoll in front of my headquarters on a beautiful night listening to the fire of the batteries. The moon was out in all its splendor, and the flashes that gleamed from the mouths of a hundred guns could be seen for miles to the right and left. Standing upon an adjacent hill to my right a tall figure was seen clothed in white. It seemed to be that of a man at least seven feet high, but the uniform was not that of a soldier. In tones never to be forgotten, and that echoed from hill to valley and from valley to hill, the words, "Cease firing," were heard from this unearthly looking figure, as though he was commanding the world and giving the order, "By kingdoms, right wheel." Summoning up all the courage at my command I hailed him with the inquiry, "Who on earth are you?" The prompt and emphatic response was, "I am Gen. Burbridge's orderly in my night shirt."

A Horse That Vanderbilt Wants.

Broklyn Eagle.

Sensation, since the departure of Tom Ochiltree, is sole monarch of the stud at Westbrook. Mr. Lorillard values him very highly. Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt not long since came to look at him with a view of negotiating a purchase for a Western party.

"Well, what will you take for your horse George?"

"Fifty thousand dollars."

"I'll consider it."

Next morning Mr. Vandebilt comes over. "I'll take that horse, M. Lorillard."

"No you won't, Mr. Vander," was the reply, and Sensation's market value remains unfixed. Deene's brother declares that all England cannot produce so fine a horse.

The Way To Go West.

This is frequently a very perplexing question to those who contemplate moving their families to the great West, the land of cheap farms and rich gold and silver mines. It can hardly be expeced that the farmer, mechanic or merchant can keep themselves fully posted on matters of transportation, so as to be able to select the cheapest, most comfortable, and at the same time the most direct line to the West, with the fewest changes of cars.

Frequent changes of cars means frequent connections to be made; to miss one of these connections causes a delay of many hours, and, of course, additional expense and trouble.

When a person once lets it become known that he contemplates moving his family West, he is astonished at the amount of interest that some people take in his prospective trip. They proffer advice freely, and tell of the wonderful rates they can procure if you will put yourself in their hands for consignment. Do they take all of this interest in your affairs for nothing, out of pure kindness to you? Oh, no; they are probably land agents, and will sell you out to some inferior line at so much per head. They will then write to the railroad company upon whose line you locate, and get a commission from them upon all the land you may purchase, which, of course, comes out of your pocket.

To all who comtemplate going West, either to settle or for a pleasure trip, deal directly with the authorized agents of a railroad company, where you can always do better than any one can do for you.

The Great Baltimore & Ohio runs their entire trains through to Chicago without change, making sure connections, and has fewer changes of cars than any other route. This old reliable through route would not permit one of its agents to deceive you, or to take any undue advantage of you. Their agents have instructions to always sell tickets via the most direct lines, and at the lowest rates. They have in their employ, as traveling agents, such men as John T. Lane, at Columbus, and J. A. Webb, at Tiffin, who will furnish you, free of charge, all information you may desire as to routes, rates, &c. Anything that these gentlemen may represent to you can be depended upon as being perfectly reliable, and we would advise all contemplating a trip West to write to them. They will reply by letter, or will call upon you in person. 9-2t.

The End of a Famous Rose Tree.

Recently a high wind destroyed the famous "Gold of Orphir" rose tree, in Grass Valley, California. A Santa Rosa paper says that the stem was 26 inches around, and the shrub itself had grown over and around an oak 50 feet high, only stopping in its upward progress from lack of something to climb upon. When in full bloom, nothing could be seen but a mass of golden flowers, forming an object of almost indescribable beauty and splendor. It was, as may well be supposed, the pride of its owner, who, when once before a strong wind partially uprooted the supporting oak, went to considerable expense to restore it to its upright position. But the recent injury was irremediable, and lovers of the beautiful in nature regret the loss.—Scientific American.

Mutilated Coins.

The director of the mint has authorized the purchase at the several mints at Philadelphia, San Francisco, Carson and New Orleans, of mutilated and uncurrent United States silver coin of standard fineness at the rate of one dollar per ounce troy, when presented in sums of three dollars and upwards.

Coins can be forwarded to those mints by registered mail or by express, charges prepaid, and the value will be returned at the seller's risk and expense by express, registered, mail, check or draft. Persons sending full weight

Director of the Mint Burchard has decided that mutilated coin must be considered as bullion only, and that refilling the holes with silver or gold does not make the coin fit for circulation as legal currency. Many coins have been so filled. The decision is approved by Secretary Folger.

Complimentary Notice.

We are in receipt of some beautifully executed chromo-lithographic seed packets from D. Landreth & Sons of Philadelphia, the pioneer Seedmen of this continent. The artistic designs and coloring are so true to nature and superior to the ordinary illustrations as to be beyond comparison. But the merit of illustration is not the most important feature, 'tis the contents of packets, and the quality of their Seeds has been proved by tests extending up to a century. Their Almanac and Catalogue is the best yet, and should be in every country house-hold. It is mailed, post-paid, to all who apply for it.

This Looks Pretty Solid,

BUT IT HAD TO COME.

THE ÆTNA IS THE SAFEST, STRONGEST AND BEST POWDER IN THE WORLD FOR REMOVING STUMPS AND STONES!

It is unnecessary to tell a farmer his land is more valuable without the stumps than with them. He knows that now. What he wants to know is the Best, Quickest and Cheapest method of removing them, and that question we answer by saying, BLAST THEM OUT WITH ÆTNY POWDER. Any stump, large or small, green or decayed, can be thrown entirely out of the ground and broken into pieces small enough to handle.

If you have any stumps, send us your address and we will send you a man to do your work, or will sell you the powder and tools so you can do it yourself. Don't delay, but attend to it at once.

Conkling.

The president last Friday sent to the senate the name of Roscoe Conkling for Judge of the United States supreme court in the place of Hunt. The nomination took the senate by surprise, and was a matter of great astonishment everywhere. The senate committee on judiciary, however, concluded to report favorably on the nomination, and the chances are that he will be confirmed. There are many who do not think he will accept. The matter has caused quite a stir in political circles, as it will retire him from politics if he should accept. Papers everywhere comment on the matter, some for him and some against. We add the opinions of two of these papers, one a democratic and the other a republican paper.

A REPUBLICAN OPINION.

The Tribune says: Guiteau has made a supreme court judge as well as president. He is not hung yet. There is no human being in the country so ignorant as to believe Conkling would have been awarded the highest judicial office in the gift of the president if a cold blooded assassin had not first murdered the president whom the people elected for that horrible murder. No man living is thought by the people of the United States more responsible than Mr. Conkling himself. The day after his resignation, his disciple, Guiteau, bought the pistol, and the very physician, who was afterward called in to probe the president's wound, went about saying that Garfield deserved to be shot.

A DEMOCRATIC OPINION.

The Sun says: He is able, learned, independent, proud and incorruptible. His training has been political rather than judicial. We shall be surprised if he accepts. We have not supposed that he regarded himself as permanently withdrawn from political affairs.

Much Married Officers.

We copy the following from an article on Edmunds' Mormon bill: Senator Edmunds is particularly anxious for some action which will take the public schools out of Mormon control. As an illustration of the far reaching character of the senate bill, the following list of officers of San Pete county, one of the most populous and wealthy counties under the existing Mormon local government, is presented: Probate Judge Jas. A. Allred, three wives; Prosecuting Attorney David Cougland, three wives; Sheriff George P. Billings, two wives; County Clerk and Recorder Wm. T. Reed, two wives; Selectmen Aaron Hardy, two wives, and Henry Beal, two wives. Every officer in the county will be disqualified and disfranchised if Mr. Edmunds' bill becomes a law by the approval of the house.

A valuable hound belonging to a man near Rett's Station, Conn., was recently run over by the cars. Crawling under a pine tree, sheltered from the cold, he lay down and was there discovered by a little dog belonging to a Mr. Reeves, occupying the John White place, next to the cemetery. The same day the hound was missed, this young dog came into the house whining for something to eat, and was given a bone, with which he dashed away, repeating this action three days, when he was followed by Mr. Reeves, who saw him carry the bone to the injured dog, and this he had done for three days. The small dog is less than three years old, and would ordinarily be considered only worth kicking out of the way. This story can be vouched for in every particular.

Another equally good comes from Los Angeles, California: A man named Schweitzer died at the Los Angeles county hospital and was buried in the Evergreen cemetery. A black dog that he owned followed the body to the grave, and has remained there since, refusing to eat or drink, and will probably starve himself to death. This case of remarkable fidelity and affection has attracted deserved comment from the Los Angeles journals.

The second centennial of La Salle's voyage down the Mississippi is to be commemorated by a fete in New Orleans on the 2d of April next. Other cities in the Mississippi Valley will also mark the day by appropriate celebrations. La Salle's achievement is of so great historical importance as to deserve the recognition of the present and all succeeding generations on this continent. The brave explorer's enterprise and genius opened the way to the development of the vast basin whose fertile fields can now furnish food for nearly the whole civilized world.

Saddest of Sad Scenes.

A sad picture was presented yesterday on the road west of the city. A wagon on its way to the insane asylum contained a woman of unsound mind. In her arms, pressed to her bosom, was the lifeless body of an infant. Three other little ones, whose destiny was the poor house, were crouched in the wagon, shivering and cold. By the woman's side sat her husband, with his head bowed in sorrow. A pair of handcuffs were locked around his wrists. The family of six was to be rudely separated, perhaps forever. Their destinations were the asylum, the poor house, the jail and the grave. The mother, it is understood, would not consent to her removal unless she could take her dead child along. The father's crime was not found out.—Sentinel, Feb. 23.

Stories of a Cat and Hen.

Mrs. A. W. Brooks, of East Eliot, in the state of Maine, has a cat 13 years old, for which she has been vainly offered $50. This learned pussy will stand up at the word of command, bow slowly or quickly as directed, walk around the room on her hind legs only dance, turn somersaults, go through the motions of holding a jewsharp in her mouth with one paw and playing on it with the other, mew when ordered, speak, kiss her paws to visitors, hold a saucer of milk on her fore legs, and lap the milk, and stand on her hind feet and with here fore paws catch bits of bread or meat thrown to her, like a base-ball player. Her kitten, a year old, will turn somersalts. The same lady has a hen which always wipes her feet on the mat on entering the house, and if asked, "How do you get your living, Biddy?" will scratch on the floor, look to see if she has scratched out anything, and then look at the questioner to see if the answer is correct.

NOTICE.—I will be in my office, at my residence, for the transaction of such township business as may come before me, on Saturday of each week until further notice. S. J. BRANDON,
Oct. 11-tf. Trustee Jackson tp

A Mexican Interior.

The house had been originally built for an ecclesiastical college, and as may be imagined, was a very easy fit for a family of three. There was an agreeable sense of unexplored space in the vistas of high, airy rooms, opening one into another, and all opening on the corridors which surround the front and rear courts.

Instead of the bedside tray of coffee and rusks served by the waiter with the impenetrable head of hair, who never knocked at the door, one awakened to the luxury of a bath, a daintily served cup of chocolate, or a bumper of hot milk, fresh eggs, fresh fruit, in the flower-scented dining room, at whatever hour one chose to ask for it. The air of early morning was indescribably pure and cool—cool enough to suggest an open fire to an English or American constitution—but the sunny side of the corridor was a very good substitute. The flowers were freshly watered and fragrant. All the galleries in Mexico surrounding the inner courts are lined with flowers. It is one of the prettiest features of their domestic architecture. The vines festooned along the arches stirred a little of the breeze which lifted and let fall the heavy leaves of the banana-tree near the dining room door. Clear shadows slanted across the pale tinted stone facade of the cloistered gallery. There was a hammock of Panama grass, swinging empty, or cradling a little daughter of the house, always attended by a fluffy white poodle, whom she addressed as "Enrique! mi alma!" (My soul!)

A man-servant of the shade of complexion called moreno-chocolate with a little milk in it—and eyes of chocolate, unmixed, in a white linen blouse, with a red sash girding the waist, shuffled listlessly about the gallery at this hour, watering the plants or sweeping the red tile pavement with a broom made of palm splints. There was a parrot, like a great jewel, on his perch in the sun. The gray turtle-doves are guarded by Mexican servants as harbingers of evil to the house where their soft guttural note is heard, but the Casa C—— rejected this superstition of the country, and gave shelter to the doves. The noises of the house were very pleasant; loud, harsh voices or footsteps were unheard; no bell ever rang. If the young mistress had need of a servant she stepped into the corridor and clapped her hands. The signal was answered by Leonarda, or Rita, or Michaela, or the disconsolate Ascension, who did everything with a gloomy air, even to the carrying about on his shoulders of the little Jose, the child of Leonarda, the Camarista. Their mediaeval associations reconciled one to the only loud noises of the house—the deep-echoing of the two gaunt young blood-hounds chained to the wall of the court below, and the stamping of the horses' feet on the pavement of their halls under the arches.

The first ceremonious meal at which the family assembled was the midday breakfast, almuerzo. This was a succession of courses, chiefly meat, in surprising quantity and variety in a climate where a very little animal food is sufficient, ending with dulces and coffee. After the soup, rice cooked in the Mexican fashion, was invariably served and eaten with bananas. The game and poultry had the advantage of the most perfect cooking over a charcoal fire. A spit is used in roasting, and every Mexican kitchen is provided with a multitude of pottery vessels, even to pottery griddles, light and clean, which seemed to me far preferable to our heavy unappetizing metal ones. From time to time a national dish appeared, rather to humor the guests' fancy for a novelty than for a preference for them on the part of the family. One called turco, I was told, is of Moorish origin. It is composed of chicken, cooked slowly in a paste made of the flour of a very small and delicately dried pea, and served with a sauce of complex flavor. Raisins and olives are an incidental feature of it, and the whole dish tastes of the Arabian Nights.

—"Have some milk this morning?", asked the milkman of Toozer, who stood at the back door. "No, not this milk, some udder milk," said the little one. And the milkman walked a chalk line away from the house.

—A little child was addressed by a gentleman the other day: "How old are you, my dear?" he asked. "Old!" said the child indignantly, "I'm not old at all, I'm quite new."—[Glasgow Evening Times.

The buildings of the Philadelphia Exhibition of 1876 are widely scattered. One is a Coney Island hotel, others are hotels at Long Branch and Atlantic City, a number are private summer residences, and now the main structure is being taken down, some of it to build stations along the Pennsylvania railroad, and the rest for an iron mill in Pittsburg. The Art Gallery and Horticultural Hall remain, as they were intended for permanent features of Fairmount Park.

Lately at Manchester, England, was held a general council of war of the Salvation Army. The proceedings throughout were of an enthusiastic but orderly character. General Booth remarked that last year they had 28 stations compared with 265 now. They had now 585 paid officers, and an income of £57,000 per annum. During the last year 9,000,000 copies of the Salvation Army literature were distributed; £20,000 was wanted for a hall at Clapton, of which they had already been promised £11,000.

A census of church attendance in seventeen large towns of England, excluding London, shows that of a population aggregating 2,000,000, about 36 per cent. attend church on a given Sunday. It must be said of the 64 per cent. of absentees that they belonged mostly to the laboring classes, who work so hard during the week as to take Sunday for a day of absolute rest. In six towns, viz: Liverpool, Sheffield, Bristol, Hull, Leicester and Wolverhampton, 270,802 persons attended dissenting churches, 177,332 those of the Establishment, and 37,880 those of the Church of Rome.

The Philadelphia Press, a successful advocate and promoter of municipal reform in that city, states the basis principle of its work as follows "The first purpose of citizens, therefore, should be to secure the best business administration. If this is promised through the success of their party, well and good; if not, there is no political stake to prevent them from seeking it through some other channel. To make the party cry the cover for choosing unworthy and dishonest men is a sham and an imposture. The first duty of citizens is to secure an honest government."

One of the worst cases of criminal depravity recently developed, is that of Maggie Sanaba, near Rock Rapids, Iowa, who deliberately shot her father dead. The murder was the outcome of an agreement between her mother, sister, and a fellow named Birch who wanted to marry one of the girls. After the shooting they arranged the body near the window, broke a pane of glass, and gave out the story that he had been shot by somebody from the outside, but being pressed to tell the truth, they confessed to the circumstances as narrated. It seems the old man had driven Birch from the house some time before, and the female portion of the household did not like it. The girls are said to be well educated and of good appearance. All the parties, including Birch, have been arrested.

A Spanish physician, Dr. Olive, deducts the following conclusions from 119 observations: 1. The cobweb, when taken as a powder, cures daily or tertian malaria fever. 2. When administered by two-gramme doses to men and one-gramme dose to children it stops fevers, usually after the second attack. 3. Its action is not so rapid as that of the sulphate of quinine, so until further researches, the cobweb powders ought not to be used in cases of pernicious fevers. 4. The powder, being tasteless, is easier to take than quinine, especially for children. 5. This remedy is a very good preservative. To make cobweb powder clean the cobwebs, dry them in the sun, and pound them in a mortar. One gets thus an ash brown powder, insoluble in water, and hardly soluble in alcohol.

A Missouri editor appreciates his profession, and states the case sensibly when he says that "people seldom realize what the world owes to editors who are preaching short sermons constantly for thousands who echo their views without a thought of the study or labor it represents. To be sure there is much matter that is weak as water, and the men who can write solidly, sensibly and concisely upon a thousand topics are not to be found in every pair of boots; yet they all work hard, and generally give more than they receive. The smallest country newspaper is worth more to its subscribers in one month than its price for a year, and does more in its neighborhood for nothing than many an official does for his munificent salary. The printing press may have an iron heart, but its work is benevolence itself; the world moves to its vibrating music. It can be used for ill, but it is generally true to its trust, and prompt to lead in every good word or work. Remember this the next time an editor fails to cut his writings so as to fit closely your particular views or fancy."

The first proof of the new five-cent postage stamp, containing a vignette o General Garfield, and known as the Garfield stamp, and which is intended as a present to Queen Victoria from the American Bank Note Company, reached Washington on Saturday. A special from Decatur, in Adams county, a station on the Richmond and Fort Wayne division of the Grand Rapids road, above Portland, says that Miss Emily Numbers, a 17-year-old school teacher, whose parents reside in that place, was outraged and brutally murdered in her school room, near Salem, a cross roads village five miles out of Decatur, Tuesday morning, by unknown parties. She graduated from the public schools at home last summer, and asked her parents to be allowed to accept a tempting offer to teach that had been made by a friend in the country. The family are in good circumstances, and move in the upper circles of society, but she was so persistent in her entreaties that she was allowed to go. It is customary in country schools for the teacher to build the fires, and she started out half an hour before the time to ring the bell for that purpose. When next seen she was lying on the floor near the stove with her tongue cut out and one arm severed from the body. Her entrails were exposed, and there were a dozen wounds on her person, any one of which would have caused her death. The clothing on the lower part of her body was torn, and there were unmistakable marks of a terrible struggle on every hand. The men had secreted themselves in the building and caught her on entering it. After forcing her to submit to them, they butchered her in the most inhuman manner, cutting her with an ax used in splitting wood for the school house stove, and stabbing her with a large knife that they carried. Their last act was to cut out her tongue, to make sure that she could tell no tales on them. The knife with which they left her pinned to the floor is the only clew by which they can be traced, but their work was so clumsily done that it is evident they are country ruffians, who can not easily cover their tracks.
